A. Sixteen ounces or two cups of milk per day will provide the necessary calcium required for children. Drinking much more than that fills kids up and causes them to eat less of other foods. Try to limit his intake to this quantity.

Q. I buy bottled water, but I wonder if what I'm buying is good quality, clean water. What should I look for?

A. The cleanest waters are usually filtered by either reverse osmosis or steamed distilled. Try these.

Majority would go for two-state solution: Nusseibeh

Asked whether Palestinians are sincerely ready to come to terms with Israel, Nusseibeh replied, " I'm absolutely convinced there is a latent readiness among Palestinians for a two-state solution. The majority would go for it."

He was asked how Israelis and Palestinians can make the transition from enmity to accommodation.

"We need to generate mutual trust based on a mutual commitment to the same terms of reference. This is where our initiative comes into play. The problem has been a lack of clarity about the end game."

Asked whether he is being naive placing his faith in a campaign that, until now, has amassed but a puny number of signatures, he said,"You're probably right. But it wouldn't be the first time naive people have determined the course of history."

When asked for examples, he was, surprisingly enough, stumped.

He brightened up after being asked whom he speaks for. "The 140,000 Palestinians who signed the petition."

He does not regard the Palestinian demand for a "right of return" as an insuperable obstacle. Palestinians should be able to choose from a menu of alternatives, he remarked.

"They can go to a Palestinian state, be compensated or be provided with the means to live in dignity in their present homes."

Unlike some Palestinians, Nusseibeh is not dogmatic on the imperative for Israel to withdraw to the pre-1967 borders.

"In theory, there should no be room for flexibility on this issue. In practice, there can be land exchanges reached by agreement."

As for the status of the Temple Mount, Nusseibeh said neither Israel nor the Palestinians should exercise sovereignty over it.

"Jerusalem needs to be an open city that will be the capital of both states. A lot of work has to be done to translate that into a reality. It can be done."

In and of itself, the internationally sponsored road map to peace is insufficient, he claimed. "The end game has to be defined more clearly."

Asked why the Palestinian Authority has been lax in cracking down on the contagion of terrorism, Nusseibeh commented, "It's a major story and I don't want to get into it, though I realize it's a question that needs to be answered."

But he added that the ultimate answer to terrorism is a "reasonable solution" that respects the aspirations and requirements of both sides.

In his view, Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – would not be capable of scuttling a peace accord. "But Hamas will become more powerful if there is not an agreement," he warned.

Nusseibeh dismissed a suggestion that a resumption of negotiations could be problematic due to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's refusal to negotiate with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

"Arafat is the elected leader of the Palestinian people, and he has as much electoral legitimacy as any other leader."

Besides, he pointed out, political positions are not immutable. "For every problem there is a solution. Politicians' decisions are subject to change."

He can foresee the day when Sharon would put aside his qualms and negotiate with Arafat.

"I've seen situations where sworn enemies shook hands and came to an agreement," he said, presumably referring to the late Yitzhak Rabin's historic rapprochement with Arafat at the start of the Oslo peace process in 1993.

"This is not a conflict between individuals, but nations. Personalities don't enter into it. I don't see any reason why Sharon won't talk to Arafat."

Nusseibeh appeared encouraged by Sharon's plan for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Gaza.

"It's generated a debate among Israelis, which is very helpful. It's also defined some of the major issues and highlighted the need for Israel to withdraw. By itself, it's not sufficient. But it can be a step in the right direction."

He was confident that Sharon will press ahead with his disengagement scheme, the opposition of Likud members notwithstanding.

Nusseibeh was philosophical about the newest wave of violence to engulf the territories – the fighting sparked by Israel's latest raid into Gaza.

"It's a tragedy and I feel extremely pained by what I see happening. Security can't be achieved by force. Security is planted in another person's heart."

JVS holds annual business awards luncheon

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

People who have overcome personal barriers to achieve success in the business world, and Canadian corporations that provide work for people with disadvantages and disabilities were recognied at Jewish Vocational Service of Toronto's (JVS) recent second annual Strictly Business Awards luncheon.

Master of ceremonies, Gord Martineau of CITY TV, presented the awards, including entrepreneur of the year, employee of the year, employer of the year, and awards for inspiration and business leadership.

The entrepreneur of the year award went to Jonathan Vanir, who volunteers for JVS Toronto's CanadaInfoNet e-mentorship program. He used the program before he came to Canada, after moving to China from Israel.

With the help of his mentor, Vanir set up a retail furniture store, Ante, in July 2003.

He is now passing on his skills by helping other newcomers to Canada.

Tracy Chen, who received the employee of the year award, participated in JVS Toronto's Women in New Roles program in August 2001.

She said when she was looking for work and became discouraged, her JVS counsellor would help her "bounce back and keep going."

Ata Moeini of Gold Line Telemanagement, the largest producer and distributor of calling cards in Canada, received the employer of the year award.

She has given job opportunities to many of JVS Toronto's employment assistance services clients.

Kathy Rudan, aWendy's employee since early 1994, was presented with the inspiration award.

Gary Williams, winner of the business leadership award, was general manager of the store that hired Rudan. He said she consistently shows reliability, loyalty and perseverance.

Richard Waugh, CEO of Scotiabank, delivered the keynote speech.

"JVS aligns very well to our goals at Scotiabank," he said.

Karen Goldenberg, president and CEO of JVS Toronto, said Scotiabank has a commitment to employment equity, and creating a workplace that provides opportunities to everyone.

"We've been delighted to be working with them to find positions within the bank for people with disabilities, for people from the aboriginal community and for people who are newcomers to Canada and trying to have an opportunity to be successful here," Goldenberg said.

The money raised from this event will help JVS create new programs.

MEET THE MINISTER: Board members of Canadian Friends of Peace Now meet with Public Health Minister Carolyn Bennett to seek the federal government's endorsement of the Ayalon-Nusseibeh principles for Israeli-Palestinian peace. The principles, which have been endorsed by thousands of Israelis and Palestinians and by key U.S. officials, were drafted by Ami Ayalon, a former head of Israel's Shin Bet security service, and Sari Nusseibeh, a former Jerusalem representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization. From left, Issie Lyon, Bennett, Sheldon Gordon and Tamar Ishaky.

Israeli bobsled team picks final member

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN — He's never been on ice, with the exception of a skiing trip, but Moshe Horowitz, a 25-year-old Jerusalem native, has been named the fourth member of Israel's first-ever bobsled team by his new teammates, former San Francisco 49er John Frank and ex-U.S. fighter pilot Aaron Zeff.

Horowitz, who beat out 12 other athletes for the job, has strong sporting credentials. The Columbia University political science major plays for Jerusalem flag football team Jump Gym and recently represented Israel at the Flag Football World Cup in the Dominican Republic. Horowitz also plays rugby for Jerusalem and was invited to join the Israel Seven's team, an invitation he will have to turn down now that he is due to commence training overseas with Frank and Zeff.

"The reality and euphoria of the win only hit me on the ride home," Horowitz said. "John and Aaron are serious athletes and serious competitors, and it's a pleasure to have been chosen to race with them."

At last month's trials, held at Kfar Hamaccabia in Ramat Gan, the candidates were tested for speed and strength. Horowitz lifted 140 kg on the bench press and more than 100 kg on the power clean before running a 30-metre sprint in 3.8 seconds and jumping 70 cm on a vertical leap.

The hopefuls were narrowed down to five and at the finals of the trials at the Wingate Institute, Horowitz beat his rivals in a 30-metre sprint pushing a bobsled on wheels packed with weights.

"We were very impressed by the skills and strength shown by the participants," Frank said.

Moshe Horowitz

In fact, Frank and Zeff were so impressed they announced the creation of a secondary squad made up of the defeated trial finalists: Israel shot put champion, Shai Shalev; shot put runner-up Shahar Mozer; Russian arm wrestling championship bronze medalist Valery Tomilov; and Horowitz's flag football teammate Aryeh Bauman, a former runner-up in the World Arm Wrestling Championships.

Horowitz has been named the team's alternate brakeman and will be joining Zeff, the team's pilot, Frank, its first brakeman, and David Greaves, also an alternate brakeman, for training in Calgary this summer.

In the meantime, Horowitz will be busy four times a week with a personal workout prepared by the team's coach Ross Dominikovich, a former athlete and coach with the New Zealand team.

Following the summer training camp, Horowitz will be sent on a bobsled-piloting course in Canada in September. After that, the season runs from November through February 2005, and the team will compete at the America's Cup, the World Cup and the World Championships, where Israel is eligible to compete in the two-man and four-man races.

Zeff and Frank only set up the bobsled team in 2002, but they have already registered impressive achievements, finishing fifth out of 14 teams in last season's America's Cup two-man bobsled standings.

Horowitz may have only just joined the team, but he is already infected by their enthusiasm and is looking beyond his first season. "Ultimately," he says, "our goal is to reach the Winter Olympics in 2006."

Gymnastics club founder coached Israeli national team

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

It's no surprise that the Discovery Gymnastics "Dream Team" finished as the top group at the recent provincial championships in Kingston and Sarnia.

Led by Jeff Soroksky, the former head coach of the Israeli national and Olympic teams, the North York club returned home with 19 medals from its 19 kids, including five golds.

Among the club's Jewish athletes, Sarah Spitz finished third in bars and third in vault for a third-place overall finish, while Emilie Attia was fifth. Natalie Gerchtein missed the competition with a hyper-extended knee, but was expected to be OK in time for the National Artistic Gymnastics Championships last month in Montreal.

Soroksky, the founder of the Discovery School of Sport and Art, says Spitz and Gerchtein are two of the four girls he expects to coach at next year's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Soroksky's gym is a training centre for children 18 months old up to 18 years of age. Since opening its doors nearly eight years ago, the multi-sport facility, which specializes in recreational and competitive artistic and rhythmic gymnastics, has added dance and trampoline programs.

Its modern, 10,000-square-foot gym is fully equipped with Olympic-standard gymnastic apparatus for boys and girls.

Before coming to Canada in 1985 on what was to have been a one-year sabbatical, the Moscow-born coach had spent the previous 10 years coaching in Israel. He moved to Israel as a 20-year-old in 1972, working for a couple of years with the Israeli Gymnastics Federation before getting involved with the national program.

Prior to leaving what was then the Soviet Union, Soroksky coached for five years at a special boarding school, training artistic gymnasts for the Soviet national team.

He also competed in the sport himself from age nine, reaching the national level with Club Dynamo.

Now a national level coach, Soroksky came to Canada nearly 20 years ago after being invited to work at Gemini Gymnastics in Oshawa, a high level club that placed athletes with the provincial and national programs.

While content that Canada has given him a nice home and a good job, Soroksky still longs for Israel.

"I'm a Jew, and a Jew needs Israel every time," he said. "I miss Israel, but I'm very much happy in Canada."

ויחי בוקר מאת: סייד קשוע

ויחי בוקר הוא ספר מומלץ לכל מי שרוצה (ובמיוחד לאלה שלא רוצים..) בשיעור עזר להבנת מימד נוסף למצב הבלתי-אפשרי שבו כולנו חנוקים.

LIME CILANTRO SWEET POTATOES

- 2 lbs. sweet potatoes, peeled & cut into 3/4" pieces
- 3 tblsps. extra-virgin olive oil
- 3/4 tsp. salt
- 1/4 tsp. cayenne pepper
- 1/2 tsp. finely grated fresh lime zest
- 1 tblsp. fresh lime juice
- 1/4 cup chopped fresh cilantro

Put oven rack in lower third of oven & preheat oven to 425°F.

Toss sweet potatoes with 2 tblsps. oil and 1/4 tsp. salt in a shallow baking pan. Arrange potatoes in a layer and roast, stirring halfway through roasting, until tender, about 25 min. total. Stir together cayenne, zest, and remaining 1/2 tsp. salt in a small bowl. Whisk together lime juice and remaining tblsp. oil in medium bowl, then add potatoes. Sprinkle with cayenne mixture and cilantro, stirring gently to combine. Makes 4 servings.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

We are most fortunate to live in a country where the religious rights of workers are protected. Despite the hardships it may cause employers, workers cannot be let go for observing religious rituals, including taking days off for the various yamim tovim. In fact, Canadian law may go even further than Jewish law in this area. Halachah has always maintained that religious practices should not be allowed to interfere with a worker's obligations to his or her employer. One dare not be religious on somebody else's account. To do so distorts the true definition of piety, as serving God is only meaningful if it causes heightened sensitivity to our fellow human beings.

Employees are to devote their full energies to their employment tasks, including limiting their activities outside the workplace. It is not only highly paid athletes who (usually contractually) must refrain from high-risk activities. Any and all activities that might cause even small amounts of financial harm to one's employer are prohibited. One may not stay up late, diet or take a second job if it would result in lower productivity than the norm. One may even require permission from the boss to watch late playoff games (sorry Leaf fans).

While it is understood that the employment culture of today allows, and even encourages, outside interests, one must be careful to ensure that the limits are not unduly extended. Failure to adhere to these restrictions is legitimate grounds for dismissal in the eyes of Jewish law. More significantly, even religious observances must at times be curtailed if they interfere with worker productivity. This includes not only religious stringencies and customs such as fasting for a yahrzeit or davening at the crack of dawn, but also basic religious requirements. Thus Jewish law orders employees to shorten their davening and curtail Birkat Hamazon (grace after meals). While these specific laws were formulated at a time when workers were expected to work from dawn to dusk, the principles are, of course, still relevant.

So, while we do expect that one should begin one's day with davening and Torah study, and perhaps even a morning jog, one must be careful to ensure that these mitzvot don't come at the expense of an even more fundamental religious obligation: putting in an honest day's work.

My friend with the 'Don King' coif

URBAN WRITER

I met a man 15 years ago at a Passover seder at the home of Julius Ciss, the director of Jews for Judaism. The man was Marty Galin. He was thunderous and jovial in appearance, and his interest in the seder had little to do with the meaning of the paschal lamb but more to do with the personalities sitting at the table.

Our friendship grew and I discovered Marty's goals in life were simple: to give as much as he could, to party as if tomorrow would never come and to create a big legacy.

Since those days, Marty and I have hosted a radio show called Marty & Avrum: The Food Guys, produced three television shows – The Moveable Feast, Beer Buddies and We're Talking Homemade, and recently signed a deal with CityTV to produce a coffee show.

Marty is unique in his character and his look. He stands about 5-foot-10, is heavyset with pinchable jowls, and his long, Don King-like, frizzy hair bobs above the crowd, eliciting attention the way Eugene Levy's eyebrows might. He is sweet and childlike in nature.

Marty was born on McAllister Road in the Bathurst Street- Sheppard Avenue area. He claims he is proud to be Jewish, but I often kid him on the radio that he is the most assimilated Jew I know, with more memories of the Santa Claus parade than of the High Holy Days, Strangely, he insists all of our food products be kosher so that Orthodox Jews can enjoy them as well.

Marty is a highly communicative man who phones many of his friends dozens of times a day, just to say hello. For years, I did my utmost to hide from his bellowing laughter and salutations when I would walk into a room crowded with high-profile people celebrating a food event.

He would drag me over to world-class chefs like Michael Stadtlander or successful restaurateurs like Peter Oliver and hug all of us, creating or perhaps forcing an atmosphere entirely void of smugness and pomposity. I think he just wanted everyone to be friends.

To this day, my friend Marty will call me and tell me about the lunch meeting he had with the president of a major corporation, or play me the phone message from Richard Simmons, the diet guru, wishing him good luck on his lifestyle changes.

These things may not seem that strange – after all he's in the entertainment business – but Marty does not have a scheduler, lives in a tiny bachelor apartment with two little white schnauzers, has a propensity to stain everything he wears and has little need for or interest in money.

Despite this, last week Marty met with three different television networks, two major corporate sponsors, the stars in our shows – and never missed a beat. He is launching a food line for a major franchise and opening a Marty & Avrum store. He wants to sell chicken.

Today, Marty writes a weekly column for the Metro News and is flown around the world by tourist associations to establish cooking schools and food businesses.

I love and admire Marty deeply. He has taught me how to be a better friend and to be gentler with people. He has a benevolent soul and has befriended the homeless, the wealthy, the famous and the downtrodden – but all in the same way – with an open heart, an enormously warm smile and a heaping portion of love and respect.

Marty is a living legend and deserves all the accolades, applause and hugs that come his way. In a Jewish community of close to 200,000, you won't find another Marty Galin.

Thank you for being there!

Birthrighters land in Israel

Some 11,000 young adults are expected to visit Israel this summer on the Birthright Israel program. The group that arrived last week was greeted by Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky, centre, and Charles Bronfman, third from right, one of the co-founders of Birthright Israel. [Israel photo]

Change marriage law in Israel, urges former chief rabbi

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former chief Sephardi rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron last week advocated dismantling the Orthodox rabbinate's monopoly over Jewish marriages – the first time any leading rabbi associated with the rabbinical establishment has publicly urged such a step.

Speaking at a rabbinical conference in Jerusalem, Rabbi Bakshi-Doron urged the repeal of the law, which says marriages in Israel must be conducted according to religious law.

Jews most targeted by hate crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A recent survey of hate crimes that found Jews to be the most targeted religious group in Canada was not a surprise, but its findings underscore the contention that a quicker response from political and community leaders might have nipped the problem in the bud, says a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Manuel Prutschi, temporary national executive director for Congress, believes the survey's findings for 2001 and 2002 were foreshadowed by a spike in anti-Semitic incidents in 2000, corresponding to the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah. Even then, as Jews increasingly became the victims of racist attacks and harassment, and afterward as the incidents increased, Congress' pleas to political leaders to speak out went unheeded, he said.

Political leaders criticized for slow response

It wasn't until a spate of incidents in the Greater Toronto Area this spring, involving swastikas on homes and vandalism of cemeteries and synagogues, followed by the firebombing of a Montreal Jewish school library, that the top political echelon spoke out clearly, he said.

Primate Won CJC Prize

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — The Anglican Church of Canada last week chose Andrew Hutchison, the Archbishop of Montreal who once received a humanitarian award from Canadian Jewish Congress, as its new primate at its triennial national meeting. In 1999, CJC gave Hutchison, a theological liberal, its Alan Rose Award for advocating the removal of references to Jews as "lost sheep" in the church's Good Friday liturgy. He also received the Jerusalem Prize from the Canadian Zionist Federation in 1995. He became Archbishop of Montreal in 1990.

Euro-MP Decries Terror

LONDON, Ont. — A member of the European Parliament spoke out against rising anti-Semitism in Europe and the European Union's support for the Palestinians in a speech last week at the University of Western Ontario. Ilka Schroeder, a 26-year-old former Green party member from Berlin, says EU funding to the Palestinians has been used to finance anti-Semitic terrorism. Her talk, titled "European Nationalism and Anti-Zionism," was hosted by the London Jewish Community Centre as part of a Canadian speaking tour.

Voting Dates Questioned

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has asked Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty to delay his proposal for fixed election dates to ensure the dates don't conflict with major religious holidays. B'nai Brith notes that fixing votes for the first Thursday in October every four years will regularly conflict with the High Holy Days, and that Oct. 7, 2007, the first vote date, is Shmini Atzeret. President Harold Davis said B'nai Brith is not against fixed dates, but prefers one in November. In tabling its proposal, the government said it would allow the chief electoral officer to postpone a vote by a week if it falls on a religious holiday.

Al Qaeda Plotter Jailed

PERTH — An Australian recruited by Al Qaeda was jailed for planning to bomb the country's Israeli Embassy. A court in Perth sentenced Jack Roche, 50, to nine years in jail last week after he confessed to the plot. Roche, a British-born Muslim convert, joined Osama bin Laden's group during a 2000 trip to Afghanistan. Australian authorities arrested him in 2002.

French Comic Acquitted on Racism Charge

PARIS — A French comedian who performed a sketch dressed as a haredi Jew making a Nazi salute is not guilty of racial incitement, a Paris court has ruled.

Dieudonné M'Bala M'Bala did not attempt to represent all Jews, the court found May 27, but rather "uniquely, a certain category of people in the expression of their political views."

The case was brought by some Jewish and anti-racist organizations after Dieudonné performed the sketch on live television in November 2003. The groups said they would appeal.

Dieudonné had already been found guilty of racial incitement and fined $6,000 by a court in the south of France for an interview earlier this year in which he said that "Jews run a very powerful lobby and control the media."

Trial Suspended

ISTANBUL — The trial of 69 members of an Islamic cell suspected to be behind suicide bombings last November in Istanbul was suspended last week after the state security court judge ruled he did not have the authority to hear the case. Two synagogues were among the targets of the attacks, which killed 61 people. Turkey is expected to set up new courts soon to deal with terrorism cases like this one.

Books Reprinted

AMHERST, Mass. — Some 700 books from prewar eastern European Jewry have been reprinted thanks to the National Yiddish Book Center. The books depict daily Jewish life before the Holocaust, through maps, illustrations, photos and Yiddish and Hebrew text. Many contain lists of townspeople murdered by the Nazis. The books, part of the David and Sylvia Steiner Yizkor Books Collection, are available online at www.yiddishbook center.org/yizkor books.

NYC Water Unkosher?

NEW YORK — Some Orthodox rabbis in New York City are saying city water isn't kosher. The water issue filtered down after copepods, tiny crustaceans, were found in the water, the New York Times reported. Crustaceans are not kosher. City officials say the water, long considered very clean, is not filtered but is safe to drink.

Too Much Tongue?

TOKYO — Kiss bassist Gene Simmons, the son of Holocaust survivors, backtracked last week from recent anti-Muslim remarks he made while on tour with the band in Australia. Simmons said he was only talking about extremists when he told a journalist that Islam "is a vile culture." He added that Muslims "want to come and live right where you live and they think that you're evil."

Jewish philanthropy: reaching the next generation

With this feature essay by staff writer Frances Kraft, The CJN introduces a new occasional series of more in-depth articles on a wide range of subjects that concern our community.

Our aim will be to focus on questions and issues that affect our readers. In the process, we hope to shine a thoughtful light on many of the different facets of life that comprise our creative and diverse Jewish community.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It has become increasingly common to see names of Jewish philanthropists – so-called "mega-donors" – on secular institutions such as hospitals, universities and museums. Although there are no hard statistics in Canada, the trend, which has been documented in the United States, is increasingly spurring Jewish leaders to look at their own fundraising efforts in a new light.

CJN Focus
An occasional series

The trend is particularly strong among younger Jews, according to a 2001 report, titled "The Transition of Communal Values and Behavior in Jewish Philanthropy," by Gary Tobin of the Institute for Jewish and Community Research in San Francisco.

What exactly is Jewish philanthropy? According to Richard Marker – a philanthropy advisor who teaches at New York University where he is senior fellow in philanthropy – there's no simple definition. Marker, who is also an ordained rabbi, says Jewish philanthropy refers to "support for Jewish causes, defined most broadly." Jewish motivation or awareness, when giving to secular causes, also enters into the definition for some people.

Donations to secular institutions "to some degree are a reflection of a larger societal reality," he said, referring to a wide acceptance of Jews in the surrounding general society, including on the boards of institutions such as universities and museums. "You can view this as a very positive situation... If the only way we look at it is [with] handwringing, then I think we don't get the full picture."

If there is in fact a problem, Marker believes it has more to do with leadership than finances. "I think many of those [donors to secular causes] have not found it as gratifying to become involved in leadership of Jewish causes."

There are people who find the Jewish world "somewhat provincial" and want to play in a larger sphere, he said. "Those who are most judgmental would argue that the Jewish world has not made it prestigious enough."

Russell and David Goldstein

Most people, however, are involved in philanthropy because they care about things, Marker said. Prestige, he noted, can

Honour in the court

From the editor's desk

At the beginning of her book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, Deborah Lipstadt inscribed the following dedication:

"To the victims and the survivors/ of the Holocaust/ and to those who preserve and tell their story/ 'Remember the days of yore,/ Learn the lessons of the generation that came before you.'/ Deuteronomy 32:7"

Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books were sued over that book by David Irving, a controversial British author who alleged that he had been defamed by Lipstadt's reference to him as "one of the most dangerous spokespersons for Holocaust denial."

The trial, which began in January 2002, was lengthy, much publicized by the press and closely watched throughout the world. Irving had cleverly attempted to put the Holocaust on trial, once again. But the decision by Justice Charles Gray effectively silenced him; he was defeated by the judgment and devastated by the awarding of the costs of the trial against him.

By not surrendering her ground or her integrity to the plaintiff, Lipstadt, ironically, stepped into the role of the individuals to whom she had dedicated her work, the very embodiment of those "who preserve and tell their story." Her decision to defend against Irving's accusations inspired Jew and non-Jew alike.

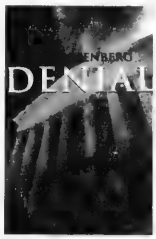
One individual who was deeply moved by Lipstadt's strength and will was Ayal Rosenberg, a lawyer in South Africa.

Rosenberg has written a fictionalized account of the trial called Denial, published by Seven Locks Press (ISBN - 1-931643-33-4).

Despite the wrenching subject matter, Denial is a cover-to-cover, single-sitting read. It was hard to put the book down. Rosenberg succeeds in getting the reader's blood to boil and heart to race. The reader's emotions are always close to the surface, especially during the scenes of the trial, which grip one's sensibilities like a tightly locked vise.

But the trial scenes are only the starting point for the author. The work is far more than the narrative of the crossing of legal swords between the plaintiff and the defendants. Indeed, as engrossing as they are, the trial scenes comprise a relatively small portion of the book.

The author constantly switches between courtroom events and reminiscence. But the reminiscences are not always the retrospective reflections of the protagonists. They are also vignettes of history concerning subjects, places and people of the Holocaust.



It is in this back-and-forth literary structure that Denial is at its imaginative and instructive best. Each reminiscence relates specifically to an aspect of the evidence read into the record of the trial.

For example, after Rosenberg introduces the plaintiff and his cause of action, he then creatively fills in the gaps of missing information surrounding the plaintiff's past.

Then, after he records the evidence from the trial surrounding allegations by the plaintiff about the "truth" of the gas chambers of Auschwitz, he delves into the macabre details of the history and operation of Auschwitz.

One of the most compelling depictions in the book is of Heinrich Himmler's visit to Auschwitz. Rosenberg re-creates the atmosphere of the camp and the conversations among the Nazi officers with such gut-wrenching authenticity as to be suffocating.

By contrast, however, some of the conversation Rosenberg ascribes to the Ernst Zundel character borders on the cartoonish. It is so stereotypical at times that it lacks credibility. (Toronto and Canada figure quite prominently in the novel. Rosenberg reminds us that Irving had been a prominent figure at the first Zundel trial in Toronto.)

Yet, despite the buffoonery of the Zundel character, Rosenberg is to be commended for the obviously voluminous level of research that he undertook for the work.

In one of the concluding scenes of the novel, Rosenberg gives the following statement to one of the Lipstadt character's lawyers: "It's the next generation that scares me. I know that there will be next generation Inneses [Irvings] by the dozen. Already, the man has become a celebrity of sorts. My biggest worry is that in our next generation with their CD-ROMS, there won't be a next generation Sheldon Truworth QC [the name of the defendant's barrister.]"

Ayal Rosenberg has made a major contribution with Denial. People should read it for its intrinsic power and educative force. But we should also read it to be reminded of the strength and the goodness of people like Deborah Lipstadt who remember the days of yore, and who have learned and impart to us the lessons of the generation that came before.

Chabad expanding Jewish life in Russia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Years ago, when Russia was Communist, officially atheistic and headed by diehard Stalinists, state-sanctioned discrimination against Jews was commonplace, as was hostility towards the State of Israel.

That's no longer the case, said Rabbi Berel Lazar, chief rabbi of Russia. Today, community relations with the most senior political leadership are good, the media are generally pro-Israel, and Jews are admired for their achievements, both in becoming "oligarchs" (extremely wealthy businessmen) and in reaching out to help their fellow Russians, Rabbi Lazar said.

The public attitude to Jews has improved to such an extent that for some, Judaism has become "hip," he added.

Rabbi Lazar, 40, gave his upbeat evaluation of the status of Russian Jews prior to a "Spirit of Community" dinner in Toronto last week that honoured Vaughan Mayor Michael Di Biase and Sol Prizant, as well as the rabbi's longtime friend Rabbi Yisroel Landa, the executive director of the Chabad Israeli Community Centre. Rabbi Lazar also spoke to The CJN at his offices in Moscow several weeks ago.

He said the public's positive estimation of Jews was enhanced during the Chechen hostage-taking in a Moscow theatre in October 2002. The terrorists were subsequently overcome by poison gas that killed 120 hostages, but prior to that, a doctor and popular entertainer Iosif Kobzon entered the theatre and gained the release of a handful of hostages.

"Both are heroes and got people out, and it came out that they were Jewish," Rabbi Lazar said.

The reputation of Russia's Jews has also been burnished, he said, by Russian President Vladimir Putin's unprecedented attendance at the opening of the Marina Roscha Jewish Community Centre in Moscow, as well as a Chanukiah-lighting ceremony and the popularity of Israel in fighting Islamic terrorists – paralleling Russia's own conflict with Chechen Muslims.

A native of Milan who was elected chief rabbi in 2000, Rabbi Lazar heads a vast contingent of Chabad rabbis and supporters who are attempting to revitalize Jewish life in the former Soviet Union (FSU).

While another chief rabbi, Adolph Shayevich, still serves at Moscow's famed Choral Synagogue, Chabad has created an infrastructure of synagogues, schools, community centres, soup kitchens and orphanages in more than 400 communities in the FSU. Outside Moscow and St. Petersburg, Chabad rabbis co-operate with local Jewish communities to restore organized Jewish life, he said.

Since the fall of communism, religious life in general has experienced a resurgence, with interest in Orthodox Christianity and Islam growing.

Rabbi Berel Lazar

Jews have maintained good relations with Russian Muslims, Rabbi Lazar said.

The mufti of Russia, his Islamic counterpart, hails from Kazan, a city southeast of Moscow which is the capital of the republic of Tataristan. Chabad helped to lobby for the return of Muslim religious properties confiscated by the Communists, while the mufti assisted Kazan's Jews in restoring their religious life, Rabbi Lazar said.

Assimilation is the main problem facing Russian Jewry, he continued, with the generation of 40- to 60-year-olds, who grew up in an atheistic environment, virtually "lost" to Jewish life. After 70 years of communism, it is often the elderly and the young who are responsible for the renaissance of Judaism.

"Very often it is the grandparents making the connection," he said. "It's the grandparents who pick up the children and bring them to Sunday school."

Rabbi Lazar estimated that only 10 to 15 per cent of the country's Jews are involved in community activities. "The rest are Jewish because they were born Jewish.

"The thousands who [emigrated] were the ones who had a commitment to Judaism. The ones who remained were totally assimilated," and restoring them to the Jewish fold is Chabad's greatest challenge, he said.

Chabad's seven day schools in the FSU serve more than 1,000 children, while there are 85 other educations institutions such as schools, kindergartens and universities that provide Jewish content, he said.

In rebuilding Jewish life, Chabad has taken a low-key approach that attempts to make make Jewish observances "positive, interesting, exciting and [show it] belongs to them... In Russia we're dealing with the ABCs of Judaism. If the basics of Judaism stay with them, hopefully with the next generation, we'll see what we can do with them," Rabbi Lazar said.

Chabad conducts its programs and services with an operating budget of $50 million (US), while capital projects involving the construction or renovation of 80 buildings stand at $80 million (US).

Chabad relies on two primary benefactors – the U.S.-based Rohr family foundation and Tashkent-born Israeli tycoon Lev Leviev. Some Russian businessmen have also contributed to Chabad projects.

One of the major undertakings currently underway is the construction of a museum in the Marina Roscha neighbourhood that will promote tolerance and employ multimedia displays on Jewish history and the Holocaust.

"We're talking about a huge project, the first of its kind in Europe," which is aimed at a broad Russian audience, Rabbi Lazar said.

Gissin spells out Israel's conditions for peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's terms for signing a peace agreement with the Palestinians were spelled out last week in Toronto by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's foreign press and public affairs advisor.

At a press conference at the Royal York Hotel, Ra'anan Gissin listed Israel's three conditions:

- It will not return to the 1949 armistice lines.
- It will not accept an influx of Palestinian refugees.
- It will retain the right to defend itself.

In Toronto on the tail end of a North American speaking tour, he declared that the pre-1967 lines were militarily indefensible and that Israel would only withdraw to defensible borders.

"Israel will never go back to the 1967 lines," he said, attributing the outbreak of the Six Day War to Israel's "indefensible lines."

"Peace with security means new borders," added Gissin, who was here under the auspices of UJA Federation.

Israel is building a security fence through the West Bank because it lacks defensible borders, Gissin said, adding that once these lines are established, the barrier will no longer be necessary.

He said a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem must be found within the context of a Palestinian state and not inside Israel.

Turning to his third and final point, Gissin said Israel reserves the right to defend itself "in all its components," and will not rely on an "outside force" for its basic security.

Gissin said the United States supports these demands.

Alluding to the settlement blocs Israel wants to keep in the West Bank, he said Jewish settlements will not be removed unless they are isolated ones.

Speaking of Sharon's plan for a unilateral pullout from Gaza, Gissin said the prime minister intends to carry it out to completion as soon as possible.

"We are not going to be there," he said of Gaza.

Noting that leaving Gaza will benefit the Jewish people, Gissin said Sharon is determined to see it through.

"Israel can't afford to delay. It would be detrimental to Israel's interests."

"We must get this thing going," he said later.

Gissin warned "sinister forces" could yet scuttle the proposal if there are further delays.

Should the plan be implemented, the focus can shift back to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, which calls for a two-state solution, he said.

"If the Gaza plan succeeds, we'd be willing to give more," he said in an indirect reference to the West Bank. "Israel is willing to make painful concessions for peace."

Qualifying his remark, he said the Palestinians do not have a leadership capable of implementing the road map.

"We don't have a partner."

Accusing Palestinian leaders of having adopted a "strategy of terrorism," Gissin said they miscalculated by launching an armed uprising.

Palestinians would be better off "dealing" rather than "messing" with Israel, he said.

Describing the current intifadah as the "worst disaster to befall the Palestinians" since their flight from their homes in 1948, Gissin ruled out the possibility of diplomatic progress until they crack down on terrorism.

But he expressed pessimism that this will happen as long as Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat controls PA security forces, adding that these forces practise a duplicitous policy by moonlighting as arms smugglers.

Blasting Arafat, Gissin said he should be retired and given "a nice pension plan."

He said new Palestinian leaders are afraid to come forward because they live under "a yoke of fear and intimidation."

Decrying the lack of law and order in the Palestinian autonomous areas, which Israel has occupied since 2002, Gissin said "Palestinian society" will collapse if the PA continues to sacrifice its young people on "the altar of hatred and fear."

According to Gissin, the Arab world has yet to accept the notion that Jews have a right to their ancestral homeland.

Ra'anan Gissin

He said anti-Semitism today is disguised as anti-Zionism, and while it is not politically correct to defame Jews, Israel can be attacked.

He said Canada can play a useful role in Mideast diplomacy by moderating Europe's "hostile" and "unbalanced" attitude toward Israel.

He described Canada's relations with Israel as "very friendly."

Asked whether Israel prefers a Republican or a Democratic victory in November's U.S. presidential election, he replied diplomatically, "May the better one win."

Gissin noted that Israel's relationship with the United States transcends party politics and enjoys bipartisan support. But he acknowledged that President George W. Bush is "a great friend."

Sharon rejects the status quo

Cabinet solidarity has never been a strong point, or even a feature, of Israel's parliamentary democracy. Nor for that matter has party discipline. Cabinet ministers and members of Knesset from the same party often squabble in public, unrestrained in airing differences over public policy and private ambitions.

The vaunted, untrammelled individuality of the Israeli personality, combined with the pure proportionality of the Israeli electoral system, create an idiosyncratic democratic system that is truly sui generis, one of a kind.

That unique, one-of-a-kind characteristic was much on display last Sunday when the cabinet voted 14 to 7 to approve Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a unilateral disengagement from the Gaza Strip. But the result of the vote was almost a side show to the high-octane, incendiary brinkmanship that preceded it.

To ensure his plan would pass cabinet, the prime minister, prior to the vote, dismissed two ministers from the National Unity party – Benny Elon and Avigdor Lieberman – both vocal opponents of the disengagement plan.

On the day of the vote, key Likud party cabinet members, and rivals for the leadership of the Likud party, Benjamin Netanyahu, Limor Livnat and Silvan Shalom, staged a mini-walkout in order to exact some key alterations to the plan. After some last-minute bargaining with the prime minister, the plan was amended and the high-profile dissenting ministers offered their support.

The amended plan contains no specific commitment to remove settlements. Rather, it specifies an "intention" to complete all evacuations by the end of 2005. But his last-minute adjustments to the proposal did not prevent the prime minister from proclaiming after the vote, "The government decided today that by the end of 2005, Israel will leave [all 21 Jewish settlements in] Gaza and four settlements [in the West Bank]. The state of Israel made a decisive step for its future. Most of the people of Israel understand the tremendous significance of the plan…"

Sharon was not overstating the case.

The plan is precedent-setting and historic; its repercussions will yet be felt domestically in Israel and abroad. Locally, it may lead to early national elections and possibly the dismantling and reconstituting of a new Likud party. Internationally, it may be the catalyst for positive change that has so pitifully and wastefully eluded the conflict for 25 years; for it may be the impetus for Egypt and Jordan to join more actively in the search for a solution to the conflict. The United States immediately expressed its strong support of the cabinet's decision.

Prime Minister Sharon has decided that the status quo is Israel's least palatable option. It is unclear if his fellow Likud cabinet ministers and Knesset members agree with him. But it appears the majority of Israelis do.

Urges community to mobilize

Democracy is about intensity, not just numbers. It is no secret that our Jewish community is a small minority in Canada. Other ethnic groups are working hard at mobilizing themselves, running candidates, becoming party activists between elections and getting a very large number of volunteers out to help with political campaigns.

Israel needs Canada's support as an honest broker. As Jews, we need to work smarter, which means doing not necessarily what we like to do or what makes us feel better, but what politicians and parties need us to do. By choosing to get involved in the political process, by supporting the candidate and party of our choice, we can make a real impact where it matters most: on our country's democratically elected decision-makers.

Elections are a time to build relationships. Now more than ever, if we care about Israel and about the quality of Jewish life in Canada, we must get involved in the political process. We need to ensure that our community members, as individuals, as well as our organizations, support candidates from all parties who seek to represent our interests fairly. How do we do that? We must spread out en masse and contact the riding office of the candidate of our choice and ask, "What can I do for you?"

To learn more, go to www.cija.ca and select "Federal Election 2004." If you care about our future you must be involved in the political process.

Election roundup was biased

The article "New leaders present their case" (CJN, May 28) was very biased and very vague. My biggest complaint is about the way the NDP was portrayed. It was almost entirely disregarded as a possibility for Jewish voters. Why? Because of "the worldwide near-abandonment of Israel by the left if not its outright hostility to the Jewish state and the Zionist dream." That is disgusting. You can't lump together all political leftists and claim they are anti-Israel. This close-mindedness is the reason many Jewish people are losing faith in the Jewish community. Some writers are dividing us, saying if we vote for the NDP, we are left-wing and thus anti-Israel.

The article also states that Canada's Muslim community is finding a home in the NDP. What does that have to do with anything? Is the author trying to say that Muslims and Jews don't vote for the same parties? Or because Muslims are voting NDP, Jews shouldn't? An article like this propagates the stereotype that all Jews vote to the right (or centre-right) by voting Conservative or Liberal, and are anti-Muslim.

I have not decided who to vote for yet, but I think if someone is so trivial and ignorant as to vote against NDP just because of "the international left" or the Muslim vote, they shouldn't vote at all.

CJN out of step with many Jews

The article on the Canadian party leaders (CJN, May 28) blatantly endorsed the Liberal candidates in the upcoming federal election. You seem to be out of step with the sentiments of many Canadians, especially Jewish Canadians, who have seen the Liberal government consistently line up at the United Nations with the enemies of Israel to condemn the Jewish state for trying to defend its citizens from terror.

If The CJN wishes to be viewed as the media organ representing the Canadian Jewish community, it must either adopt a position of non-partisanship in Canadian politics or promote those views that would enhance the welfare of the Jewish community in Canada and the world at large.

Criticism of Landy unfair

Yaakov Roth attempts to paint Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) as biased in favour of the Liberal party ("Objects to Landy's opinion," letter to the editor, June 3). Did he not notice or did he wilfully omit CJC outgoing president Keith Landy's comment that the Conservative Party policy on Israel has been "sterling"?

CJC is a representative organization that strives to act in the best interests of the Jewish community of Canada with concern for our brothers and sisters in Israel and in the rest of the Diaspora. To do this effectively, we remain non-partisan. CJC maintains professional and cordial relations with members of all the main federal and provincial parties in this country. For a Jewish organization to do otherwise would be irresponsible and imprudent.

We are quick to praise and equally quick to condemn policies of all parties, including the sitting government. On that our record is clear. This is done on an issue-by-issue basis, not by partisanship. We also criticize and commend members of the government – including the prime minister – or opposition, but this depends on their words and actions, not their party affiliation.

I admire Roth for his passion and political activity. As a former assistant to Conservative MP Jason Kenney in Ottawa, as well as being president of the Conservative party at York University and past president of the York Canadian Alliance Association, he exemplifies the type of activism and commitment that we could use more of from this country's youth in general, and Jewish youth in particular.

It's still good to be a British Jew

By MICHAEL COREN

North Americans have never understood Britain. Probably never will. And why should they? The British have no real understanding of North America. To the people of the Sceptred Isle, American and Canadian alike are loud, brash, dumb and rich. But nice as well.

Throw in Jewishness and the fog is so thick we can hardly see. I've long met Canadian Jews who assume that Britain is far more anti-Semitic than Canada and that being Jewish in Britain is not easy. Odd thing is, I never found this. I have three Jewish grandparents and was raised in a secular – deeply secular – Jewish home.

I'd heard some anti-Semitic drivel in Britain, but the first anti-Semitic comment I ever heard from an intelligent person was during my first year in Canada, when I was 27 years old. It came from a noted CBC producer, who told me that she had been "Jewed out of some money." I told her I was offended. She apologized.

The issue of Britain and the Jews has come to the fore because Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the British Conservative Party, has elected Michael Howard, a Jewish man whose father was an immigrant from Romania, as its leader. The Tories were led by Benjamin Disraeli more than a century ago, but although obviously and famously Jewish, he had as an infant been baptized an Anglican by his anxious father.

This is not the case with Howard, who held high office in the last Conservative government. Indeed his Jewishness had never been much of an issue, and was never remotely likely to disqualify him from being prime minister, as would, almost certainly, homosexuality or skin colour.

Yet people reacted, or over-reacted, when one of Britain's leading television hosts, Jeremy Paxman, asked a member of the Tory party if the British people would vote for someone with origins in Transylvania. This was seen by some as evidence of anti-Semitism. Spare us!

I know Paxman a little bit and such racism would be inconceivable. If he is known for anything, it is for being an extremely bright and forceful interviewer, and also for being, well, rather rude. In fact the standard comic parody of Paxman is of someone being abrasive and not taking politicians' answers very seriously.

One could argue that to not ask such a question would have been disingenuous and unprofessional. Was "Transylvanian" a code word for Jewish? Doubtful. It was probably code for nothing more than Transylvanian. Or, to be politically incorrect, foreign. It was Howard's father's place of birth, not his religion, that was the issue. Another contender for the leadership has Spanish Catholic ancestry, and this was discussed far more often.

Similar questions were asked in the United States about Senator Joe Lieberman during his quest for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination. Would the American people vote for a Jewish president? It seemed that they would. Would the Brits vote for a Jewish prime minister? They did more than a century ago. Margaret Thatcher had Jewish ministers in most of the top positions in her cabinet, and longtime Labour prime minister Harold Wilson was very philo-Semitic.

In his partly fictitious diaries, the late Alan Clark, a junior minister under Thatcher, wrote about a comment he had heard concerning "too many Jew-boys in the cabinet," but this was strenuously denied by all concerned. Clark was a snob and a liar, and often invented a world that simply was not there.

Having said this, there surely will be people in Britain who will not vote Tory because of the ethnicity of the party's leader. But they are so tiny in number that they are largely irrelevant. The Tory MP with the largest number of Muslims in his riding is a man named Paul Goodman. A Jew and a strong Zionist, he is one of my closest friends.

Benjamin Disraeli

As with most things British, it is all very confusing. If you want to find anti-Semitism, it is there. I'm sure that a young man named Ivan who was the perennial victim at my high school believes that he was bullied because he was Jewish. He wasn't. It was because he was weak, plump and annoying. God forgive me, I bullied him too.

Yet in an area that was perhaps 20 per cent Jewish, there were a few anti-Semites at the school. So few, however, that I can remember them by name. They had a very hard time of it.

Which brings me to the Tottenham Hotspur story. Tottenham, or Spurs, is my soccer team. Always have been, always will be. They've been mediocre for years now, but that's irrelevant. I bleed blue and white. They're also known as the Jewish team, and local rivals refer to them as "The Yids." Shock and horror. Thing is, Spurs fans also refer to themselves as "The Yids," whether they're Jewish or not. Israeli flags sometimes fly, and Stars of David abound on T-shirts, often worn by Anglo-Saxon, Irish, Italian, Asian and black supporters.

It's a tribal issue, a way of identifying one team's fanatics from another. The irony is, our arch rivals Arsenal have at least as many Jewish fans and had Jewish directors and part-owners long before Spurs ever did. How to react to thousands of people chanting, "Yids, Yids?" With understanding. Put aside the neurosis and know what is going on. This is not harmful.

Michael Howard

Across London is Chelsea. Now here there is some harm. This team has as its chairman a highly objectionable character named Ken Bates. Chelsea is infamous for attracting the small number of Nazis who live in the city. Perhaps not the team's fault, but it could do a lot more to reject this malodorous minority. Yet when Chelsea played, and lost to, an Israeli team in a recent European competition, Bates made a nasty little comment about selling tickets for the game at a discount.

A demonstration earlier this year in London against Israel, one of many that have been held there by supporters of radical Islamists. [Carrie Devorah photo]

Anti-Semitic? Without doubt. But Chelsea was purchased last year by one of Russia's new billionaires. He is Jewish. A delicious irony, but it does not disguise the fact that if a major sports figure – a club chairman – made such a comment in North America, he would be in serious trouble.

Which brings us to the new reality: the increased dislike of Israel amongst the alleged British intelligentsia and the rise of Islam in the U.K. Ordinary Brits have never really changed when it comes to Israel. They give it vague support. The right has been transformed, becoming pro-Zionist. So has the left, becoming increasingly anti-Israel.

Again, nuance is vital here. The Labour Party is still overwhelmingly supportive of the Jewish state, but its left wing is sometimes hysterically pro-Palestinian. This has reached into some areas of the media and the universities. But please do not judge Britain by the odd article that appears in a Jewish or Israeli newspaper. As I said at the start, all North Americans are loud, brash, dumb and rich. Does that hurt? Is that true?

Take the journalist John Pilger, one of Britain's most famous leftist broadcasters. He is a passionate supporter of the Palestinian cause. I wrote a book with John and was his researcher for some years. He's a friend. I think he's wrong about Israel. I also know him to be as pro-Jewish as anyone I've ever met. It's just that John, like so many others on the thinking left, has managed to draw a dichotomy between Jews and Israel.

It's made all the easier, by the way, by the number of Jewish left-wingers who are anti-Zionist and often say things that no non-Jew would dare to say.

Paul Goodman, my old friend the MP, says this: "We haven't been helped by the neo-con approach that the war in Iraq is all about a new Middle East based on American foreign policy. The right in Britain agrees with the war, but to get rid of a dictator and not to be part of grand Washington plan, one that is, frankly, seen as being heavily influenced by Jewish people.

"It's not that this is anti-Semitic as such, but when the Daily Telegraph, the voice of intelligent conservative opinion, has columns by David Frum and Mark Steyn all the time, people do wonder what is behind it all. Has it got worse? Yes. Has it got much worse? No. It's rather like those comments that are never made unless someone is drunk. People now, as it were, don't have to be quite so drunk."

Now to the rise of Islam. Unlike France and most of Europe, Muslims in Britain are overwhelmingly from South Asia. They tend to be less vitriolic on the Middle East. Having said this, one of the thugs who arranged the murder of Danny Pearl was from my hometown. Unlike me, however, he did not go to the state school, but to the expensive local private school.

No, I'm not naïve. I was raised too poor and working class to enjoy that privilege. But neither am I over-sensitive. The Jewish road in Britain is still smooth. The difference is that a generation ago, there was hardly a genuine speed bump anywhere to be seen. Nowadays, one has to drive with just a little more care.

Opinions

The true heroes of D-Day

It is too easy to forget 60-year-old heroism. On June 6, 1944, D-Day, 175,000 Allied soldiers crossed the English Channel and stormed the beaches of Normandy. There, they encountered tripwires, landmines, flamethrowers and fortifications. By the end of D-Day, 2,500 soldiers were dead. But their sacrifice was not in vain. Eleven months later, Europe and its concentration camps were liberated from the Nazis.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

The soldiers were unlikely victors, a mixed multitude of (mostly)18-to-20-year-olds. The Allied armies took everyone, from squirrel shooting rural boys to bookish big city scholars. Inexperience made no difference. Peter Masters, a Jewish refugee from Vienna, was in the British Army's 10th Commando Brigade. When he enlisted, he was asked whether he could shoot a gun, handle a boat, or work a radio. He replied that he had once shot a BB gun, occasionally rowed a boat, and had never used a radio. The army took him anyway.

Remarkably, these amateur warriors developed into a courageous and powerful fighting force. And these average Joes are the true heroes of World War II.

The Scottish writer Thomas Carlyle advanced the "great man theory of history." According to this view, it is the exceptional people who decide the fate of humanity. The teeming masses are mindless followers, moulded by the great man in his image. Indeed, there is ample biblical evidence for this theory. Abraham, Moses, Joshua and David seem to singlehandedly start religions, win battles and even stop the sun.

However, it's usually the small, anonymous heroes who save the day. The Book of Judges is filled with marginal characters who suddenly find themselves thrust to the forefront. Gideon, Jepthah and Deborah are everyman heroes, little guys filling a void in leadership. In chasidic lore, God listens closely to the peasant woman's sigh and the ignorant shepherd's flute, and he saves the world because of their simple petitions. The grandiose prayers of the great man cannot compare to the sincere words of the little guy.

D-Day was a triumph for the little guys. They risked their lives, fought courageously and liberated Europe. Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower reported on how he went to see the U.S. 101st Airborne division before they took off for D-Day. On the runway, he saw a short private, "more equipment than soldier," who turned to him and saluted. Then the private turned in the direction of Germany and said: "Look out Hitler, here we come".

It is because of privates like him that Europe was liberated.

Great men arrive all too infrequently. The rest of the time, it's up to everyone else to rescue the world. As we find ourselves embroiled in an international war against terror, it's time once again for the little guy to come to the rescue.

The trouble with Mary

When McGill University invited Mary Robinson to receive an honorary doctorate, I thought "not here, not now." I knew that, as a former president of Ireland and a former UN Human Rights Commissioner, she is an iconic figure to some. But I also knew that to those who remembered the ugly UN World Conference against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001 which became, in Justice Minister Irwin Cotler's words, "a conference of racism against Jews," Robinson was a negative icon. She stood silently as the conference was hijacked, only belatedly objecting to the anti-Semitic caricatures distributed there.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Worse, during the preparations for the conference in Teheran and Geneva, she did not stop the Jew-bashing – and sometimes, she even emboldened the Islamic extremists. My historian's instincts sensed that as colleagues lionized her, they would sanitize Durban, with this failure listed as a plus on her resume. When we need lions to fight anti-Semitism, it hurt me that my university would celebrate a lamb linked with the Durban debacle, which crossed the line from merely criticizing Israel to demonizing Jews, with many "human rights" activists acquiescing.

I expected that raising these issues in the Montreal Gazette would trigger debate, but I was shocked by the libels that rained down on me and the Jewish people. In print, colleagues lambasted me as a "disgrace," as "selective" and "biased," and – in one revival of traditional anti-Semitism – as being among "the forces of money and greed that dominate our world."

Privately, I and other critics were demonized as "right wingers" – academic-speak for evil idiots – by people who know nothing about me beyond my zero tolerance for anti-Semitism and terrorism. Others criticized the "organized Jewish community's" campaign against Robinson, when the alphabet soup of Jewish organizations we spend so much money underwriting stayed silent. Fortunately, many others condemned McGill's inappropriate decision – both Jews and non-Jews – although more people remembered the few attacks on my integrity than the many defences, some by people who knew little about Durban, but felt the character assassins went overboard in demonizing me while not debating the issue.

I remain unbowed, uncowed, and happily tenured. The pro-Robinson attempts to sanitize Durban confirmed my worst fears. I remain a McGill patriot, believing in the university, and its mission, even if I criticize it. Defensive bureaucrats cannot demonize me. I urge people to support McGill, even as I urge people to fight oppression wherever it appears, be it through hatred or sloppiness.

Still, this ugly episode taught me a lot.

I learned that anti-Semitism, like all bigotry, cannot only be fought when ruins are smouldering or people are bleeding. It needs to be confronted proactively, wherever it festers, even in cases that might appear ambiguous.

I learned that the moral leadership question is more crucial than ever, and that more community leaders need to combat anti-Semitism forcefully.

I learned that there are too many anti-Semites out there, and there are too many "innocent bystanders" who don't fight anti-Semitism like they fight feminism, racism or other hatreds.

I learned that too many people politicize and contextualize anti-Semitism, as Robinson frequently has. To condemn anti-Semitism, we must repudiate it unequivocally. Choose another time to preach to the community about criticizing Israel, or any other imperfections.

I learned that my "slob theory of history" – people are often asleep at the switch – applies to fighting bigotry. This episode uncovered some hate mongers, but when McGill selected Robinson, when the controversy "surprised" administrators, when the university house organ published an anti-Semitic screed, most of those responsible were simply not doing due diligence and not being sensitive. They were not motivated by animus.

I learned about the intolerance of the supposedly tolerant. Our anguished cry about the Robinson award during a time of rising Jew-hatred should have elicited sympathy from human rights activists, not contempt.

I learned that universities have become entrenched bureaucracies, embarrassed by legitimate debate, preferring to squelch iconoclasm.

I also learned many positive lessons, about the many people across Canada, and throughout the world, Jews and non-Jews, who remember the Durban debacle and criticize Robinson for her failure. They also reject the double-standard of the UN human rights community – the subtext of this debate – while they mourn McGill's bad judgment and stand ready to fight anti-Semitism wherever it festers.

Women and Judaism in the True North

The rhythm of the academic year is such that, come spring, my thoughts turn eastward. One of the things I most look forward to each summer is davening at Jerusalem synagogues that I have come to know and love. Among my favourites are an Orthodox shul where women regularly give divrei Torah and girls mark becoming bat mitzvah by reading Torah on shabbat morning; a nearby Reform congregation that swells with song led by a woman each Friday night; and a Masorti minyan in which women lead morning prayer. Who would not fall in love, again and again and again, with Judaism?

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

In Toronto, my home, that love is harder to spark, at least for women. Particularly in traditional Judaism, but even in liberal movements, opportunities for women's active participatory experience in Jewish ritual life are slim. There are a few – a very few – women rabbis in Toronto. No major Conservative shul has a woman rabbi, despite the fact the Conservative movement has ordained women since 1985. Few synagogues offer women the opportunity to read Torah or to take an aliyah regularly, despite responsa on this in the Conservative movement, and I know of no daily minyan that counts women in the necessary 10. Toronto has a strong and cohesive Jewish community, a burgeoning day-school population and an enviable richness of Jewish life. And yet, across movements, the range of options for women's engagement in Jewish spiritual life are far greater both in Israel and the United States than they are right here in Toronto, or in Canada generally.

I respect the boundaries of Halachah, and the right of each stream within Judaism to define its interpretation. But limiting the horizons of Jewish women does not always come down to upholding an unbending Halachah. Judaism has always engaged in re-examination and redefinition. About 75 years ago, the Bais Yakov movement in Krakow began offering Jewish girls a solid grounding in Jewish texts. It may be hard for us to remember just how revolutionary this movement was, overturning the centuries-old practice of denying this education to girls. Radical as the concept was then, by now it has been mainstreamed in all branches of Judaism.

When I was in high school, I would listen to the shul president's usual shabbat morning announcements. He would urge the boys to play basketball in the shul's gymnasium during the week: Sunday evenings for the university boys; Mondays, grades 11 and 12; Tuesdays, grades 9 and 10; Wednesdays, grades 7 and 8, and Thursdays, 3 to 6.

One Shabbat, it struck me that no evening had been designated as girl time at the gym. I did not play basketball. But it rankled me that no provisions were made for girls. I decided to speak to the president and the rabbi, who raised the matter with the board. One month later, I received a phone call: "Congratulations. Wednesday is girls' basketball night, and you're in charge." It would be my responsibility to lock up the equipment and the gym. I came every week. I learned to shoot hoops.

Needless to say, basketball is a far simpler matter than active participation in synagogue ritual life. But take it as a metaphor.

You sometimes hear it argued that women are on a "higher spiritual plane" and have no need of the rituals that engage Jewish men. Yet it would be a peculiar religion, indeed, that excluded from active participation precisely those who seem most spiritually resonant.

The truth is, many Toronto women are eager for greater participation. Deeply moved by their first aliyah, first time leyning, first time leading tfillah in the rare opportunities to be found in Toronto, they fall in love with Judaism and want more. But increasingly, I meet young women in their 20s who have already decided that synagogue life offers them nothing of spiritual moment, and they turn off Judaism. It's a shame. In a time when Jewish organizations worry about "Jewish continuity," it seems strangely counter-productive to discourage a large number of Jews eager to embrace Jewish practice and Jewish spiritual life.

The Kirshner File

U.S. war vet tried to suppress his memories

William Shapiro suppressed his pain and anguish like a hurtful secret for more than 50 years. "None of the survivors talked about it," he mused. "To tell a story, you have to relive it. And who wanted to relive it? So you didn't want to tell it. It was a horrendous experience.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"Besides," he added, "who would have believed it?"

On a recent Sunday morning, Shapiro opened the floodgates and released his pent-up memories. He spoke in carefully calibrated tones, and once in a while, as he paused, there was a catch in his voice and his eyes misted over. A 78-year-old retired gynecologist from Boca Raton, Fla., Shapiro is only now coming to terms with the trauma that mentally disfigured him.

Shapiro's descent into hell began on Dec. 17, 1944, a day after Germany launched a surprise offensive through the Ardennes forest. The Battle of the Bulge was Hitler's desperate, last-ditch attempt to turn the tide of World War II. Shapiro was 19, a medic attached to the U.S. army's 28th Infantry Division.

He was crunched up in a foxhole when the flash of an exploding German shell knocked him unconscious. He awoke, with a splitting headache, in a railway station that had been converted into a first-aid clinic. "Someone shouted, 'We're surrounded by SS troops!'" Amid the chaos, Shapiro received instructions to remove his incriminating dogtag, which bore the letter H for Hebrew. "I threw it into a potbelly stove."

Hopelessly outgunned and outnumbered, Shapiro's battalion crumbled. "We surrendered with our hands high up," said Shapiro, who returned to the station in 1999 and found a photo of that potbelly stove.

Taken to a nearby hotel and left there without food or water, the prisoners of war were then force marched into Germany, to the town of Gerolstein, and crammed into boxcars for a four-day rail journey. Conditions were atrocious. Prisoners had to defecate where they stood and drink their own urine. "Wounded men were wailing and screaming."

Famished, thirsty, dirty and unsteady on their feet, they disembarked at Stalag 9B, a terrifying PoW camp 35 kilometres from Frankfurt that held thousands of Allied troops. "We were relieved to get out. The stench and the overcrowding had been unbearable."

But worse was yet to come.

Six weeks later, after having been segregated in a barrack reserved for Jewish soldiers, Shapiro and several hundred of his fellow PoWs were shipped to Berga, a town in eastern Germany that housed a slave labour camp, a satellite of the notorious Buchenwald concentration camp. There, in flagrant contravention of the Geneva Conventions, the PoWs were put to work in back-breaking labour digging tunnels into the rock cliffs along the Elster River. Overworked, abused, beaten and starved, some of the PoWs died of injuries, malnutrition and disease. A few simply lost their minds.

This little-known footnote of World War II, the subject of Charles Guggenheim's remarkable documentary Berga: Soldiers of Another War, which was screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, brought Shapiro to Toronto for a couple of days last month.

William Shapiro

Born in the Bronx, a New York City borough, Shapiro was the son of eastern European immigrants who had landed at Ellis Island, the gateway to America, in the early 1900s. His parents, Jacob and Dora, had five sons, of whom Shapiro was the youngest.

Drafted in September 1943, he did his basic training in Illinois and Washington, D.C. Subsequently, he was shipped to a base in Britain. On July 28, 1944, more than a month after the D-Day landings and on the eve of his 19th birthday, Shapiro was dispatched to Normandy. Within days, he was under fire. "The ground shook. The noise was deafening. I was frightened." He remembers the moans, groans and screams of soldiers who had been wounded.

In the waning days of August, Shapiro's division reached Paris, which had already been liberated. From delirious Paris, he was posted to an old farmhouse along the Our River, facing Germany's Siegfried line. It had been a quiet area during much of the war.

During that unusually frigid winter, in the deceptive calm before the storm, Shapiro enjoyed rare privileges. He was well fed, had access to hot showers and had plenty of time to write letters to his worried parents.

But then the furious Battle of the Bulge erupted. Though the Germans were eventually routed, they inflicted heavy casualties on the U.S. Army and captured scores of Americans. Upward of 2,000 American soldiers, including Shapiro, found themselves in Stalag 9B in Bad Orb. On arrival, they were interrogated. "With a name like Shapiro, it was quite evident I was Jewish," he said. Shortly afterward, the Germans placed Shapiro in a segregated barrack. "I was ghettoized," he said indignantly.

In a further violation of the Geneva Conventions, the German commandant asked the top-ranking American officer, an ethnic German named Hans Kasten, to produce a list of Jewish soldiers in the camp. Countering that a PoW was required to reveal only his name, rank and serial number, Kasten refused to abide by his demand. Kasten's integrity earned him a thrashing. Not to be denied, the Germans singled out 350 soldiers who, they assumed, were Jewish. A considerable number were, in fact, Christian. In an unmistakable sign of their special status, they were guarded by the SS with dogs.

"Our job was to clean the latrines," said Shapiro, who at that juncture knew nothing about the Nazis' plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe. They were allowed to leave the barrack for only meals, which generally consisted of bread, a gritty soup, horse meat and ersatz coffee. To pass the time, they played card games for cigarettes. Shapiro won a lot of cigarettes and traded them for additional bread rations. "I could supplement my diet. That's how I survived."

During his internment, Shapiro once escorted eight very sick PoWs by train to a neighbouring camp where British prisoners were held. "I realized how much better off they were than us." Prior to returning to Stalag 9B, Shapiro was permitted to shower and change his clothes. As well, he was given a Red Cross parcel – a cornucopia of tinned meat, powdered milk, cheese paste, candies, vitamins, candles, cigarettes and packages of sugar.

On Feb. 8, 1944, Shapiro was marched to a rail siding, having been told he would be transferred to a German hospital as an orderly. For five days, he shared a boxcar with prisoners the Germans had designated as Jews.

"I was very apprehensive. I felt lost," said Shapiro, whose symptoms of post-traumatic stress still flare up as occasional nightmares.

Berga, designed for political prisoners, was simply hellish. "I saw emaciated men in striped uniforms. This was different. We didn't know what was in store for us." They were placed in three filthy barracks with triple-tiered bunk beds, a single wash basin and a hole in the floor that served as a latrine.

By Berga's standards, Shapiro was assigned a relatively cushy job. He brought food to the political prisoners, with whom he was forbidden to chat, and worked in the dispensary. Nevertheless, Shapiro felt the sting of his confinement. "We lived in inhumane conditions. We were starved. We were covered with lice. We spent our nights crushing them."

At least 30 Americans died at Berga. "Many gave up. They had become zombies," Shapiro said in sorrow.

On April 6, with the war fast drawing to a close, the Germans evacuated Berga, compelling the prisoners to trudge southward to Bavaria in what was nothing less than a death march. At one point, they came upon the decaying corpses of hundreds of political prisoners who had been callously dumped in a field. "It was a most gruesome sight. I thought I was walking through the Valley of Death."

Shapiro, finally, was liberated on April 23 after he spotted an American tank column. He weighed 102 pounds and was skin and bones. "I remember saying, 'Thank you, thank you' repeatedly. I was so dehumanized. I was mentally destroyed."

After a six-week period of recuperation in Britain, Shapiro was flown home and reunited with his family and his girlfriend, Betty, whom he married in 1947. They had three sons, all of whom became physicians. "I could not believe I was back home," said Shapiro, who was decorated with the Bronze Star and Purple Heart. "There was no conversation about what had happened, but Betty helped me regain my humanity."

Shapiro studied medicine under the GI Bill of Rights and practised at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York City until his retirement.

Several years ago, he received $90,000 in reparation payments from Germany. "It wasn't the money," said Shapiro, who considers himself a Holocaust survivor. "We wanted recognition from Germany that U.S. soldiers had been put through this experience."

It is an episode he will never forget.

Oberlander case throws war crimes process into question

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A decision by the Federal Court of Appeal to restore the citizenship of Helmut Oberlander, an interpreter with a Nazi murder squad, puts into question Canada's entire process of removing war crime suspects, a top immigration lawyer contends.

"The decision basically guts the process of war criminal citizenship revocation," said Winnipeg lawyer David Matas. "It is the equivalent in revocation cases of the [Imre] Finta decision [in criminal prosecutions]. It's basically a blanket immunity. It would spell an end to the effort and mean our laws aren't working and that we're a haven criminally and civilly."

Matas, who also serves as senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, said federal authorities should appeal the case to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Keith Landy, outgoing president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "Holocaust survivors feel insulted by the decision, in that the victims weren't accorded the kind of deference and treatment we as Canadians are giving Oberlander. The sense of frustration is being keenly felt."

He also called on the attorney general to seek an expedited appeal to the Supreme Court.

Last week, the Federal Court of Appeal released a judgment that overturned a lower court decision and restored Oberlander's citizenship. Oberlander had been stripped of his citizenship by a decision of the federal cabinet based on a recommendation by the minister of citizenship and immigration.

That recommendation came after Federal Court judge Andrew MacKay ruled Oberlander had entered Canada after he lied about his wartime service in an SS killing unit.

Evidence at that trial showed Oberlander, an ethnic German living in Ukraine, joined Einsatzkommando (Ek) 10a in October 1941, after Germany invaded the Soviet Union. He served as an interpreter with the unit, which was created specifically to murder Jews and other enemies of Nazi Germany.

The appeal court decision, written by Judge Robert Décary, with Judges Edgar Sexton and B. Malone concurring, quotes MacKay, who found that Ek10a operated under the SS and was one of four similar task forces that carried out Nazi objectives.

"Among their roles they operated as mobile killing units and it is estimated that the Einsatzgruppen and the Security Police were responsible for the execution of more than two million people, mostly civilians, primarily Jews and communists, and also Gypsies, handicapped and others considered unacceptable for Nazi Germany's interests," the Appeal Court judgment recounts.

Having reviewed the trial judge's comments, the appeal court judges nevertheless write that despite "substantial execution activities, Justice MacKay made no finding as to whether Ek 10a was an organization with one single, brutal purpose, e.g. a death squad."

They go on to cite the trial judge's findings that there was no evidence Oberlander personally participated in war crimes and that in reporting to cabinet, the minister didn't refer to Oberlander's assertion he was involuntarily conscripted.

The judges downplay Oberlander's wartime service, saying the minister failed to explain why the government's policy, which is to apply only to suspected war criminals, "applied to someone who served only as an interpreter in the German army." (In fact, Oberlander never served in the German army, but was attached to the SS.)

The court goes on to say cabinet's decision was not reasonable, since it failed to "examine and decide that Ek 10a was an organization with a single, brutal purpose and that Oberlander was complicit in the organization's activities."

Matas called that line of reasoning "strange."

"What we have in Oberlander is in effect denial of the criminality of Einsatz groups" which had been established at Nuremberg, he said. What's more, the judge is overturning Canadian law, which holds that misrepresenting key facts when immigrating is in itself grounds for inadmissibility. The appeal court, in effect, is saying that if you weren't caught in a lie when you entered the country and you got away with it for 50 years, you can't later lose your citizenship, he said.

Matas said Décary is the same judge who overturned the deportation of Leon Mugasera of Rwanda, who had made a radio broadcast that prompted murderous rampages in that African nation.

"What we have here is a judge [who is] creating a system of immunity for the most serious criminals we've ever seen in this country," Matas said.

Landy agreed that Oberlander's presence in Canada is a result of "fraud," but he suggested the case did not serve as a precedent for other war crimes cases.

Educator's career began in the playground

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Zita Gardner, 65, who will be retiring as director of Leo Baeck Day School this year, said she experienced her defining moment as an educator 53 years ago.

Zita Gardner

It was in the early 1950s, when some things were different for schoolchildren. Students recited The Lord's Prayer at the beginning of each day and gym classes were gender divided.

But some things were the same. It was never easy for a new kid to begin school after friendships and cliques were already formed, Gardner recalled.

In the John R. Wilcox public school playground, William Moffat – a teacher so affected by polio that he could walk only with the aid of two canes – came over to a little girl standing alone and offered her an opportunity to get involved in the lunchtime sports program he was running.

The little girl was Gardner. She was 12 years old and had just moved into a new neighbourhood and school.

"I was the new kid and very much an outsider to the tight group of girls in the schoolyard," she said.

"That teacher took a little girl who didn't know a soul and offered her an entrée into the school. At that time, I realized how much of an effect one teacher can have on a kid's life, and felt that one day, I would like to provide that kind of support for somebody," Gardner said.

The young girl went on to complete a bachelor's degree in physical and health education at the University of Toronto after she graduated from J.R. Wilcox and Vaughan Road Collegiate, where she went back to teach science and girl's physical education.

In 1960, she married Allan Gardner and the couple moved to England for four years so that her husband could pursue a pathology residency at King's College Hospital in London. In England, Gardner taught at the Hammersmith Country Girl's School, a secondary school in the West End of London, until her first daughter, Gillian, was born.

Eventually, the Gardners moved back to Toronto, had two more children, Joel and Jonathan, and Gardner settled into her role as mother and wife.

"In those years, I did a lot of volunteering at my children's public school and became chair of the York Mills Family School Council," Gardner recalled.

But her life as a professional volunteer ended when she was offered a job as a Grade 8 religious school teacher at Holy Blossom Temple, where her family were members.

What began as weekend work evolved into a supervisory position at Holy Blossom's senior religious school.

Four years later, Gardner moved to the United Synagogue Day School where she became the junior high school co-ordinator. She was later promoted to the position of principal of USDS, Beth Tzedec campus.

During those years, she completed a master's degree in education, took the principal's qualifications course, and passed the provincial supervisory officer's exam.

In the spring of 1992, Gardner responded to an ad in The Canadian Jewish News for director of the Leo Baeck Day School.

"I applied, was appointed and I've been here for 12 years," Gardner said.

"It's really been an incredible journey," she said. On June 1, she was honoured by the Leo Baeck Day School for her 26-year commitment to Jewish education.

Looking back, Gardner said she believes the greatest challenge facing educators today is learning to treat each child as an individual.

"That doesn't mean providing an individualized program for each child. It means recognizing each child for who they are, building on their strengths and helping them develop those areas that are less strong," she said.

Gardner believes it should be a child's fundamental right to have the best possible teacher in each classroom.

Teachers face a huge task, she said. They need to focus on the behavioural, social and emotional factors of a child's school day to ensure that all the children feel safe, comfortable and happy in their environment so that the best possible learning can take place.

"And administrators face the challenge of pulling together a large group of people so that they're all working in the same direction," said the director of two campuses that include 90 staff.

In terms of curriculum, Gardner said children should know who they are as Jews first before they can begin to deal with other cultures and people.

"There has been a shift in the Reform movement," Gardner said, recalling that when she first taught Grade 8 at Holy Blossom the curriculum focused on comparative religion.

"We spent the year teaching about Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, visiting churches and so forth. Somewhere along the line, there was a realization that the children need to know Judaism first before they learn about other things," she said.

Despite being the first female director of a Jewish day school, Gardner said she has never really experienced any kind of hostility or discrimination from any part of the community.

She also says she was fortunate to have had a husband who supported her endeavours over the years. Allen, who was director of Genetic Services for the eastern region of Ontario and director of Genetic Services at the Lakeridge Health hospital network, died two years ago.

Now, Gardner says it's time for her to move on. She'll spend some time dealing with her husband's death and volunteering in different areas. But she's not worried about what's next.

"I've always been a person who has taken advantage of opportunities that present themselves," she said.

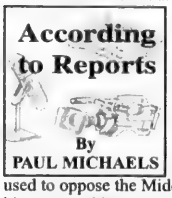
Don't blame Israel for U.S. foreign policy problems

With U.S. problems escalating in Iraq, some media analysts have begun pointing to Israel as the scapegoat for America's misfortunes in the conflict.

New York Times columnist Nicholas Kristof pushed this argument to new lows on May 26 in "The Bush and Kerry Tilt."

Wrote Kristof: "Our embrace of [Israeli Prime Minister] Sharon hobbles us in Iraq even more than those photos from Abu Ghraib."



Kristof also criticized U.S. Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry for his support of Israel. Kerry, wrote Kristof, "has generally been sensible on the Middle East. But in recent months he has zigged and zagged away from his record (he used to oppose the Middle East fence, for example) to plant his own wet kisses on Mr. Sharon."

Kristof argued that Kerry should "have the leadership to acknowledge what 50 former U.S. diplomats wrote in an open letter to [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush last month." The letter castigated the U.S.-Israel relationship and blamed Israel for a wide range of ills, including hurting U.S. prestige and credibility abroad.

Kristof ignored the fact that these "50 former diplomats" are hardly neutral observers – most are well-known for being closely linked to Arab interests. Indeed, their press conference was sponsored by the Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, the most prominent anti-Israel lobby group in the U.S. capital. (Among Canadian media outlets, only CBC covered the press conference.)

While Kristof made a passing, token reference to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's failure as a leader, his main target was Sharon: "Indeed it is my guess that Mr. Sharon has done more to undermine Israel's long-term security than Yasser Arafat ever did."

"Guess" is the operative word here. Kristof, a former Rhodes Scholar, has based his column on emotionally laden, over-the-top rhetoric and, it must be said, prejudice. Almost every line can be challenged on the basis of both facts and context.

Kristof approvingly quoted former U.S. Special Middle East Envoy Anthony Zinni, who "told the Center for Defence Information this month… [that] the road to Baghdad led through Jerusalem. You solve the Middle East peace process, you'd be surprised what kinds of other things will work out."

Unfortunately, this simplistic theory – that the key to stability and reform in the Arab world is to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict first – is gaining support. It assumes that the United States has never been deeply engaged in the peace process, and forgets the efforts of former U.S. president Bill Clinton, who tried mightily, alongside former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, to give the Palestinians a viable, contiguous state at Camp David in the summer of 2000 and in the following months. Arafat rejected that deal. It also ignores the fact Bush, the first president to formally endorse the idea of a Palestinian state, remains committed to a two-state solution and to a process of getting there: the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan.

The Economist, in its May 29 "Special Report: America and the Middle East," wrote: "The very first requirement of the road map is for the Palestinian Authority to impose a cease-fire and disarm the terrorists." The road map is stalled precisely because Arafat has refused to act against terror.

The Economist's careful and fair-minded analysis – in an influential publication not known for its sympathy to Israel – is an important contrast to Kristof's mindless rant.

The Economist should be read by the editors at the Toronto Star, who, sadly, chose to reprint Kristof's screed in the Sunday, May 30, "World" section (where, just one week before, Haroon Siddiqui's column, "Bush, Sharon lurching from crisis to crisis" made many of the same points, minus the vitriol).

Reasoned analysis serves the Canadian public much better than blind, uninformed, anti-Israel invective.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Run or walk for Mount Sinai

Participants in the upcoming Mount Sinai Hospital's Run/Walk for The Best Medicine campaign will enjoy a fun-filled day with live entertainment, great prizes and a family fun festival.

The community run/walk, on Sunday, June 20, is now in its second year and supports the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre. Presented by Scotiabank, the 10-km run and 5-km run/walk starts at 9 a.m. at Queen's Park in downtown Toronto.

This year's goal is to raise $400,000.

The funds go to support the enhancement of patient-care areas and the upgrading of equipment and technology, as well as funding cutting-edge research.

"As a community that binds together, we can make a difference in awareness, diagnosis and prevention," says Dr. Marla Shapiro, co-chair of this year's event.

Barbara Bregman, co-chair of this year's event, says that what the community can do and how much they can get involved with the hospital is often underestimated.

She adds that the response to the run/walk has been tremendous. "I have been involved in numerous fundraising events, but never have I seen a response like this."

Mount Sinai Hospital is a world-class health-care facility that delivers the best in patient care, teaching and research.

For more information about the run/walk, please call 416-586-8203.

Of giants and grasshoppers

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

In the Torah portion we read this coming Shabbat, Shlach-Lecha, Moses sends 12 spies to scout out the land of Canaan. They panic after seeing what they consider to be giants and complain, "In our own eyes we were like grasshoppers, and so we must have seemed in their eyes too." They dishearten the whole people of Israel when they proclaim, "We cannot go against that people, for it is stronger than us." The last word of the passage in Hebrew is mimenu. Rashi translates the passage as "it is stronger than God," since mimenu can also mean "he." The spies actually believe, Rashi suggests, that God cannot prevail over these giants. Thus, their sin is a failure of faith, which they project onto everyone else.

But the midrash in Numbers Rabbah understands it differently. Their sin is one of self-defeatism, and the projection is not of their lack of faith, but of their own insecurity when they say they seemed like grasshoppers in their own eyes: "When they said 'So were we in their sight,' God asked: 'Did you know how I made you appear in their sight? Who can say that you did not appear in their sight as angels? What have you brought upon yourselves?'"

What we bring upon ourselves when we wallow in self-defeatism! Why do we obsess about how we look to others? How often, as Jews, do we feel like grasshoppers in "their" eyes? And who are these giants we measure ourselves by? First, the prevailing secular culture: we constantly wonder how "they" see "us." Are we "too Jewish"? Do we "pass"? Although we are wildly successful in almost every secular field; although we have achieved unbelievably high positions in government, the civil service and industry; although we are known as general philanthropists to every good cause in Canada; still we worry about not being "good enough" in "their" eyes.

But what is more significant, and for many of us deeply painful, is the way we see each other as Jews. Are we grasshoppers in "their" eyes – that is, whoever is to the right of us religiously? Do we constantly look over our right shoulders? Who is the ultimate judge of what we do religiously – "them" or God? Are we grasshoppers in our own eyes vis-a-vis our fellow Jews?

Humility is a good thing, when tempered by reality and based on true achievement. A professor of mine in rabbinic school used to chastise us if we got piously overhumble by saying, "Stop. You aren't great enough to be that humble." But humility is not the same as insecurity. Not everyone is a giant, and neither is everyone a grasshopper. Our self-image as Jews – and the kind of Jews we may choose to be – shapes our ability to act decisively and confidently. In Numbers 24, we read that Joshua and Caleb, the confident ones, the optimistic ones, had a "different spirit." So should we.

The March of the Living

By GEORGE HERCZEG

The March of the Living is a very worthwhile cause. Every Jewish school should make an effort to send its students on this program. But not just Jewish schools – the program is for everyone who cares about the future of humanity. It is important for every human being to see what we survivors saw in Poland, not just for Jewish people.

All decent people should see how barbaric humanity is capable of becoming.

In 10 to15 years, none of us survivors will be here to tell the truth. So if these young students don't come on the trip and tell people what they saw and learned on the March of the Living, then the deniers of the Holocaust will win.

If people can send a three-year-old child – the same age as my grandchild – to the gas chambers, what kind of human beings are they? How can human beings sink so low?

For things like this to happen is simply unbelievable – but they happened!

And if we are not careful, they can happen again.

I'll tell you a story: When we visited Auschwitz-Birkenau, the guide and our group went into one of the barracks. I was having back trouble, so I stayed outside. Suddenly, I heard sirens and lights started flashing. Two motorcycles passed me, followed by a few limousines, more motorcycles and a large number of Polish police and security people. I learned later that one of the limousines was carrying Israeli Justice Minister Tommy Lapid and Israel's former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, both of whom were there speaking at a ceremony in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

And you can't imagine what an uplifting feeling that was, for me a survivor, to see an Israeli justice minister and a former chief rabbi being escorted here in Auschwitz with such honour and dignity. All the money in the world couldn't buy me such a feeling!

And then we went to Israel.

On Yom Hazikaron – Israel's Memorial Day – we attended a ceremony at Yad La'Shiryon, the Israeli Armoured Corps Memorial and Museum at Latrun. At the ceremony, the students in our group saw many young soldiers, in uniform, standing on guard for the State of Israel.

We saw the names of 4,900 Israeli soldiers who have died fighting with the Israeli Armoured Corps since 1948 written on a wall at Yad La'Shiryon. They sacrificed their lives not only for the state of Israel, but also to defend all of world Jewry.

It is so important to that Israel exists today – and forever. In Jerusalem, I watched the sun rise over the city and it was such an incredible, emotional feeling to see what the Jewish people have built in this country.

For anyone who has lived through the Holocaust, to come on this trip – to leave Auschwitz-Birkenau and travel to Israel, and not to be afraid or intimidated, to see us living as a free people – it's a tremendous feeling. It gives you such a feeling of self-respect and dignity that you can't imagine!

Every person in the world deserves to have such a feeling!

George Herczeg lives in Toronto. He told his story to Eli Rubenstein.

Jewish MP3s: one-of-a-kind music

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We may be the People of the Book, but we make some fine music, too. And if you don't feel like hearing one more rendition of Havah Nagilah, you're in luck. The Internet allows you to track down rare Jewish tunes you might not find anywhere else. Today, we'll visit some one-of-a-kind Jewish MP3 sites.

But first a reminder: while the artists that I mention allow the downloading of their music, it is intended for personal, non-commercial use only. In addition, commercial artists do this because they hope if you like the free song then you'll pay to hear more.

The Jewish National Sound Archive at the Hebrew University has done a remarkable job tracing the role that music has played in Jewish communities in Europe and the Middle East, as well as in Israel itself. The archive has selected highlights from its 7,000 hours of recorded music that include historic songs for the High Holy Days, Sukkot and Purim from around the Jewish world. You can download everything from Esta Noche de Purim as sung in Tetuan, Morocco, to the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach's rendition of the Chanukah candle blessings. And if you want to impress your guests at next year's seder with a new tune or two, start practising now. You can download 12 versions of Echad Mi Yodaya (Who Knows One) from Morocco, Greece, Turkey, Italy, Persia and Yemen. [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/dl/music]

While at the Jewish National Sound Archive, don't miss "Songs We Loved to Hear," a selection of songs that predate the creation of the State of the Israel. They include a very scratchy Birkat 'Am (1922), a schmaltzy rendition of the classic Kalaniot (Anemones) and a foot-stomping performance of Doda Haggidi Lanu Ken (Auntie, tell us "'yes" – we want to get married) (1935). These tunes can only be enjoyed online, but they are well worth the visit. [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/dl/music/yom/hsongs.htm]

I wasn't familiar with the thriving Bukharian Jewish music scene – until now. There is a wide variety of artists and styles at BukharianJews.com. (Please note the copyright restrictions on the bottom of the page.) [http://tinyurl.com/213qv] From there you can travel west to sample Italia! The Renaissance of Jewish Music. [www.zamir.org/cds/details.cgi?cd=919]

After you've listened to some music, you may want to take a break and enjoy a story or two. There are some wonderful Yiddish tales you can download in both English and the mamaloshen. The National Yiddish Book Center site presents Peter Riegert reading Sholom Aleichem's On Account of a Hat. In it, "a hapless shlemiel making his way home by train in time for Passover experiences an absurd mistaken identity crisis when he inadvertently dons the hat of a military official." And in I.L. Peretz's If Not Higher, a skeptic who tries to disprove that a rabbi ascends to heaven every year learns a lesson that changes his life forever. [www.bikher.org/story.php?n =11]

Israeli storyteller Sara Blacher-Retter has a dozen more classics on her site in the original Yiddish. And if your mastery of the language is a bit rusty, you can also print out all the stories and follow along. [http://yiddish.haifa.ac.il/Stories.html]

Of all the Jewish MP3 sites that I have come across, my favourite is probably the one devoted to Chazzan Moshe (Murray) Bazian. It's not because I'm a particular fan of cantorial music. Rather, it's because this website (and its copious MP3 files) are obviously a work of love. [www.chazzan.org/] Ben Bazian has created an extensive site that follows his father, "among the great cantors of our time," from his early years in Kishinev, Bessarabia, to his immigration to the United States and his years as a cantor in the Bronx and Brooklyn. There are plenty of lengthy excerpts from Cantor Bazian's concerts along with a biography of the chazzan. When we consider the power of the Internet and its ability to let the world hear about talented individuals who may otherwise be overlooked, Ben Bazian has done his father – and us – a service.

I am about to start preparing my semi-annual column about your favourite Jewish and Israeli websites. If you've created a site you're proud of, or find yourself visiting one over and over again, tell me about it at the address below. I'll mention the best this summer.

Our tree of life

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

One of the articles that was made for the Tabernacle, and likewise was present in both temples, was the menorah, or lamp stand. Next to the Magen David, the menorah is probably the most recognizable Jewish symbol. We have many traditions that inform us of the style of the original menorah, and from there we have numerous interpretational depictions as well. In fact, the modern artistic impressions of this ancient article display sleek lines and angles that can easily erase the visual meaning of the original menorah, as it is described in the Torah.

At the beginning of this week's Torah portion, Aaron is told to go up to the menorah and light the seven lights. Clearly, the stature of the original menorah was quite high, as it involved Aaron ascending to the top. From the description given earlier of the menorah, we understand that it has three branches coming from each side, which gives a total of six arms reaching upward. The centre stand also extends upward with a light on its top, bringing the total number of lights on the menorah to seven.

Each arm was decorated with cups shaped like almond blossoms, and the central shaft had knops ascending toward the light on top. Likewise, the menorahs in the temples were decorated with flowers described as almond blossoms. The entire structure comprised a central shaft with arms coming out from its side. Along these arms appeared cups shaped like almond blossoms, which were filled with oil and lit. Knops are also present on the shaft. The menorah described in the Torah and used in the temples resembles a tree in its structure and adornment.

Yet why would a tree be important in the symbolism of the menorah? Our minds immediately return to the Garden of Eden and the two trees there: the Tree of Knowledge and the Tree of Life. After eating from the Tree of Knowledge, humanity is exiled from the garden. The Torah tells us that God keeps us out of the garden not to punish us for sinning, but to prevent us from eating from the Tree of Life, which would bring immortality to humanity. The image of the menorah unites these two trees into one.

We also see this when we participate in a Torah service and recite a verse from Proverbs. The Torah is referred to as "the tree of life to those who hold strongly in her." And yet there is no disputing that the Torah is the centre of Jewish knowledge: our Tree of Knowledge. The Torah has also united both trees into one.

When we look at the menorah today, with its sleek lines and angles, it is important that we also remember how the original menorah looked. It was not simply a useful article that gave light. It was symbolic of the trees we encountered when we first entered the world. It was symbolic of the Torah, our link to our beginnings. By seeing the "tree" beyond the menorah, we understand that it is through Torah and our connection with God that we have access to the Tree of Life, to immortality.

The Mishnah in Avot tells us of the Torah: "Turn it over and turn it over again for everything is in it. Pore over it, grow old and gray over it. Do not budge from it. You can have no better guide for life."

Aaron is told to elevate himself to light the lights of the menorah. The original menorah of the Tabernacle is gone, but we still have our tree of life in the Torah. May we continue to elevate ourselves to it.

Eilat paves the way for Toronto road

By ROCHELLE KAHN
UJA Federation

As a tangible expression of a warm partnership, the road leading into Eilat is being refurbished and renamed in honour of Toronto. The 850-metre road will be enhanced with new lighting, signage, landscaping and a redesign of Eilat's entrance square.

Eilat Mayor Yitzhak Halevi explained that he wants to ensure that, not only area residents of Eilat, but everyone who visits from around the world will know what Toronto has done to develop the area's community and social services

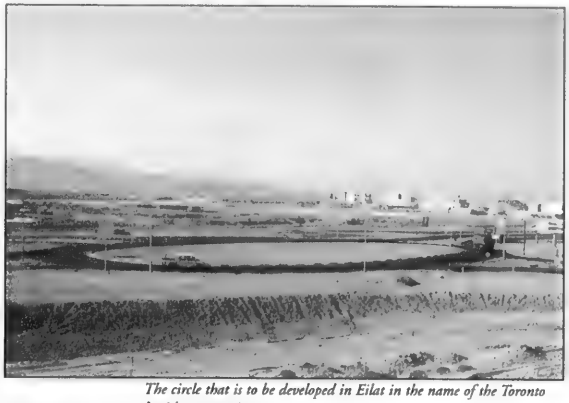
It all began in 1988 when UJA Federation of Greater Toronto forged a living link with the city of Eilat to improve conditions there. This unique initiative, involving the entire surrounding Eilot region, under the Partnership 2000 program (P2K), has flourished in the years since.

"The people of Eilat are eternally grateful to UJA Federation and the Jews of Toronto," Mayor Halevi said. "Toronto keeps its finger on the pulse of what's happening here and never forgets us. We want everyone to know that you are always in our hearts, as we are in yours, and the road renaming project is a lasting symbol of this permanent bond."

"Twice a year, a delegation of Toronto volunteers meets with our partners in Eilat to plan for the coming year and take a first-hand look at the people-to-people projects we support in the region," said Barbara Bank, who co-chairs the Partnership 2000 committee with Warren Kimel.

There's been enormous progress in the 17 years since the relationship began. Laura Kindler, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's representative in Israel, noted that the number of students graduating from high school has tripled because of Toronto's investment in Eilat's education system. "Eilat recently won Israel's Prize for Education," Kindler said, "in recognition of reaching a 60% matriculation rate." Many other community initiatives, created through Partnership 2000, have positively advanced the quality of life for students and youth, including children at risk and those facing domestic violence.

"We are grateful to Eilat and Mayor Halevi," Bank said, "for this new tribute, honouring the special relationship we share. Eilat has become a city of friends and, as a member of Toronto's Jewish community, I feel a special pride every time I'm there. I would encourage everyone who visits Israel to visit Eilat."



The circle that is to be developed in Eilat in the name of the Toronto Jewish community.

B'nai mitzvot honour Holocaust twins

By ROCHELLE KAHN
UJA Federation

The idea of twinning a bar or bat Mitzvah celebrant with a child murdered in the Holocaust came to life several years ago and has grown since into a powerful – and increasingly popular – way for North American youth to add special meaning to their simcha.

That was certainly the case for the five students of the Morris Winchevsky School who recently celebrated their special day.

Lucas Meilach-Boston spoke on their behalf and described the strong connection he now feels with the Holocaust. "My twin was Polish and so integrated that he never expected to be hated for being Jewish," Meilach-Boston said. "I hope everyone will remember how much of a tragedy this was. We need to let those who survived feel that something is being done to tell people about those who died."

Choosing to participate in the program involves a strong personal commitment. With the support of UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre, participants pick a twin: a child victim who may or may not have been related to them. They assume responsibility for researching their twin's life, touring the centre and interviewing a survivor. The b'nai mitzvah create the twinning ceremony itself and a pamphlet, describing the experience and the twin's story that is presented to everyone attending the service.

So far, 14 students have graduated from the program and eight others are enrolled. Mary Siklos of Toronto's Holocaust Centre, who attended the recent Winchevsky School ceremony, was impressed by the dedication shown by the five participants.

"Their divree Torah (religious remarks) were so well researched and clearly reflected what the program meant to them," she said. "This kind of interactive education is especially important today. These kids will teach their friends not to be racist or intolerant."

"Each Jew must bear witness, do something that personally affiliates them with the Holocaust," explained Jason Leizer, who taught the Winchevsky contingent. "My students introduced their twins before they even introduced themselves and that sends an extremely powerful message about remembering."

"The greatest mitzvah our young participants perform," observed Eleanor Getzler, who sits on the Holocaust Centre executive, "is remembering children who have no one else to remember them. It is said of those who perished in the Holocaust that, to each one there is a name. The b'nai mitzvah kids give them a name."

Exhibit helps immigrant artists

For many new immigrants, adjusting to life in their new city can be a lonely and frustrating experience. Creating a network of social and professional contacts can take years.

Thanks to the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre in partnership with JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, six immigrant artists who have brought their artistic visions from their countries to their new homes in Toronto will have the opportunity to display their works and meet the public during an art exhibit and reception.

"They were all very eager to participate in this venture, and are grateful for the chance to begin making new connections, to share their talent and experiences, and to re-establish their reputations as artists," says Janis Roth, executive director, JIAS Toronto.

The exhibit will consist of an eclectic collection of pieces, ranging from photography to abstract acrylic paintings created by artists from the Former Soviet Union, Israel, Argentina, and Mexico.

One of those artists is Paula Slimovitch. Born in Argentina 33 years ago, Slimovitch, an abstract painter, has lived in Toronto since April 2003.

"It was very hard to be an artist in Argentina. It's not a good place for people in my profession," she says. "I wanted to come to Toronto for a long time – I waited two years for the chance. I love Toronto because it is a big city with people from all over the world. The people here are so nice to me. This art exhibit is an example of how they've helped me here. This will help people know about my art and, if I can sell something, that would be wonderful. If not, it will maybe open other doors."

The public will be able to meet the artists and view their works at the opening of the exhibit, which will take place on Sunday June 13, 2004, from 2:00-4:00pm, at the Loggia Gallery of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, located at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst Street. The works will continue to be on display until July 11, 2004.

Campaign 2005 focuses on a secure Jewish future

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign 2005 is concentrating on the need for a secure Jewish future at a time of rising antisemitism, including disturbing antisemitic incidents in Toronto.

Chaired by Robert Harlang and Chuck Winograd, the campaign will be investing new funds in four areas:

- Strengthening the community's Jewish voice on issues of urgent concern
- The need for community security in the wake of antisemitic outbreaks
- Israel's extraordinary needs brought about by nearly four years of terror and a weak economy
- Linking unaffiliated young Jews to Jewish life

Ariella Rohringer, vice chair of UJA Federation Campaign 2005.

"To build a secure Jewish future requires enormous investment," said Winograd. 'Existing funds are just not there – to boldly speak out against antisemitism; to provide for terror victims in Israel; and to expand our own community's security needs."

"The growth of anti-Israel and antisemitic hatred has reached levels that most of us haven't seen in our lives," said Harlang. "In addition, we were recently shocked by expressions of antisemitism in our own city. These acts of hatred should serve as a wake-up call to all of us including thousands of young people with no links to Jewish life."

Campaign details were recently revealed to campaign leaders at the new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

Howard Sokolowski (l), a past UJA Federation Campaign chair, spends some time with Campaign 2005 chairs Chuck Winograd (centre) and Robert Harlang at a recent leadership briefing held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

"Today, thanks to the resources established through the UJA campaign, Jewish students and academics in Canada are beginning to assert Jewish dignity and Jewish honour," said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the keynote speaker at the Leadership Launch. "Today more than ever, they understand the need and the obligation of all Jews to stand up and be counted as Israel's first wall of defense in the Diaspora. We must continue to create an atmosphere on campus with the understanding that from university and colleges emanate the leaders of tomorrow."

The official launch of Campaign 2005 will take place on August 30 at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

Huge turnout for Walk with Israel

Walk features a drive for life

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The Chairs of UJA Federation's Walk with Israel are overwhelmed by the number of participants who joined this year's event.

An estimated 20,000 people, led by Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino, walked with Israel and against hate, along the 6.5 kilometre route to the RioCan Festival at Ontario Place.

"The community's response to this important Walk with Israel, and walk against hate, was simply remarkable," said Peter Ekstein, chair, along with David Peltz of this year's Walk. "I feel so much pride in our incredible Jewish community which, once again, turned out in incredible numbers, full of so much enthusiasm, to let the world know how much we stand together with Israel."

"The sun certainly shined on us that day," said Peltz. "The Walk was a great example of what we – as Jews – can do when we come together to let the world know that we simply will not, and cannot, tolerate racism and hate in any form, against any of us. It was an incredible day, an incredible turnout that brought Jews from all backgrounds and beliefs, together for Israel."

The festival – chaired by Felicia Posluns, Beth Singer, Nelly Zagdanski and Sara Zagdanski, featured fun for children, a barbeque for all ages, and an Israeli mall.

At the festival, more than 200 walkers gave even more of themselves by seeing if they qualified as bone marrow donors.

"We probably had about 220 or 230 people come to us to see if they could help by donating their bone marrow," said Dr. Gordon Arbess, HIV primary care physician at Toronto's St. Michael's Hospital, and the man who set up the bone marrow facility. "Unfortunately, some of them didn't qualify as donors due to various medical conditions. Still, we probably had about 190 donors, plus another 20 volunteers, who helped out with the registration. The bottom line is, all it takes is one person to provide a match to save the life of somebody from somewhere around the globe. It could turn out that one of those people who came out to support the Walk with Israel might also save somebody's life. It's just incredible."

Dr. Arbess, who is with the Gift of Life Marrow Foundation, initiated the registry on behalf of a 9-year-old Jewish boy from New York who is suffering from leukemia. Donor matches are generally found between people of similar ethnic or racial backgrounds.

The mandate of the Gift of Life Marrow Foundation is to increase Jewish representation in the worldwide bone marrow registry, which includes roughly 8 million people but only 300,000 Jews.

"The beauty of the match between the UJA Federation Walk with Israel and the bone marrow registry is that people were able to walk in support of their community, and, at the same time, possibly save a life," he said. "The Walk with Israel was the perfect Jewish environment in which to seek donors."

For potential donors, the screening process was a painless experience. They didn't have to endure needles as they would when giving blood; but rather a swab on the inside of the cheek.

After the tests were completed they were sent to a lab where they were analyzed. If a match is found anywhere around the world, the donor will be contacted and he or she will be asked to undertake a more specific blood test.

Although Dr. Arbess was too busy to enjoy the Walk with Israel, his son wasn't.

"My son, Joshua who is 41/2 finished the Walk before he came to help me at the registry. He said he had a terrific time and that the walk was a blast!"

"Government leaders at the national level failed to recognize, despite our best efforts, that anti-Semitism was a deep problem and that it wasn't just a matter of individual, isolated incidents, but was part of a pattern. Unfortunately, we did not have a declaration in the early period in the first two years or so, condemning anti-Semitism as a whole," Prutschi said.

The Pilot Survey by the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics Centre compiled the findings of 12 Canadian police forces in 2001 and 2002. A total of 928 hate crime incidents were reported in that period, with 57 per cent motivated by race or ethnicity and 43 per cent prompted by the victim's religion.

"The largest single group identified in the pilot survey was Jewish people or institutions. One-quarter of the 928 hate crime incidents reported by the 12 participating police services were anti-Semitic in nature," the survey, published by Statistics Canada, reported.

"In the case of anti-religious hate crimes, about two-thirds included acts of vandalism, arson, other property offences and hate propaganda."

Trailing "Jewish" (26 per cent) as victim groups were, black (17 per cent), Muslim (11 per cent), South Asian (10 per cent) and gay and lesbian (nine per cent).

Karen Mock, executive-director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, agreed that earlier public denunciations of the anti-Semitic incidents might have deterred subsequent events.

"We continually need to call on leadership at all levels of the system and when they don't [speak out], it gives licence for those people to continue," she said.

Public denunciations must be accompanied by educational programs, inter-community dialogue and "sanctions" against perpetrators for deterrence to be effective, she added.

Mock noted in the post 9/11 world, a "volatile climate" was created that saw "anti-U.S. feeling and the scapegoating of minorities when people feel anxious. We know Jews are scapegoated when times are bad."

In the post 9/11 climate, a trend developed that saw "a huge rise in incidents versus Muslims and Arabs and those thought to be Muslims. Police data showed they levelled off to baseline, but the anti-Semitic incidents continued escalating," Mock said.

A spillover effect from events in the Middle East contributed to the increase in the number of incidents, Prutschi agreed.

"A lot of latent anti-Semites see the climate as being more propitious for them to engage openly in anti-Semitic activity," he said.

Karen Mock

"Some incidents were caused by individuals coming from sectors of the Muslim and Arab community, but many of the incidents are more than likely the work of a whole range of anti-Semites. A large proportion of the anti-Semitic incidents have a Middle Eastern component to them," with threats and attacks to property explicitly referring to the Middle East, he said.

Referring to the anti-Semitic statements by aboriginal leader David Ahenakew in December 2002, Prutschi said, "The Middle East is an excuse that allows these perpetrators to think this kind of discourse is more acceptable."

Prutschi said Congress is hoping the Senate, which is studying Canadian anti-Semitism in committee, will issue a resolution condemning the phenomenon. "We hope a similar type of resolution will be brought forward and adopted in the House of Commons."

Manuel Prutschi

Canada is obliged as a member of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) to comply with the organization's Berlin Declaration and condemn and combat anti-Semitism, he said.

Mock said a recent panel in Markham, Ont., which involved Jews, police, politicians and members of other religious groups, agreed that extremists should not be allowed to set the tone of inter-group affairs. That discussion, she said, is "a kind of model we need."

In a news release, B'nai Brith Canada called upon the government to ensure that dedicated hate crime police units are established across Canada.

"These latest findings only highlight the growing need for such measures. The officers of such units, who are given specialized training and are sensitized to the multicultural communities they serve, can play an invaluable part in gathering this important data," the release stated.

Only paid Mazel Tov announcements can be guaranteed to appear in a specific issue, when received by deadline, 10 days prior to publication date. All other items will appear on a first come, first served basis as space allows.

Theatre company lets observant Jews take part

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

For many Orthodox Jews, the dream of being in a theatre production is impossible. How do you tell a director that you can't rehearse or perform on Friday night or Saturday and can't wear certain costumes?

To overcome the problem, two years ago York University students David Levine and Maya Rabinovitch created Pushover Productions, a theatre company that gives observant Jews the opportunity to participate in theatre productions.

"I spent most of my childhood" acting and working behind the scenes, Rabinovitch said, and "it was a constant fight to make people accommodate me."

Sometimes she could not be involved in productions because she would not perform on Saturday night.

"Theatre is a world that Orthodox Jews can't enter," Levine said.

Rabinovitch said she always felt as though she had to choose between her religion and her passion.

"There's no reason that one should take out the other," she said. "I don't think anybody should be short-changed just because they have another part of their life."

Shira Stanleigh, a York University student who acts in the company, said Pushover Productions is "groundbreaking.

"I don't have to explain myself or my special circumstances," she said.

At her previous theatre company, Stanleigh was the only shomer Shabbat actress.

"They were completely accommodating," she said, "but I was not able to fully experience the theatre world because of my religious distinction.

"I would never ever compromise [my religion]," she said, "but it was my disadvantage. People sort of got better opportunities than I did."

Levine said the response from Orthodox actors has been great.

"They've been really excited," he said. "For some people this is a dream we can make happen."

Pushover Productions is currently working on its third play, Jean Anouilh's Antigone. The cast is university-aged, and includes Orthodox and non-Orthodox Jewish students, as well as non-Jewish members.

"It's interesting to watch people get along," said Levine, "and watch the non-Jews learn [about Shabbat] and respect that."

Levine said the non-Orthodox and non-Jewish members have been "really understanding. They like having the weekends off."

Rabinovitch said the actors understand the reason behind Pushover Productions because they share a love of theatre.

"They really admire the fact that David and I have taken it into our own hands and created something for ourselves, rather than wait and have someone find us."

Levine said not working on Friday or Saturday can cause some difficulties when preparing for a play.

"If the show is opening on Sunday, and on Friday afternoon the set isn't built or the lights aren't quite right, we still have to stop," he said. "This is a commitment that comes first."

Rabinovitch and Levine also have to consider the costumes and blocking of scenes.

Levine said they often have to redo a costume if the actor doesn't feel comfortable in it.

A scene had to be cut from Antigone where Stanleigh's character and a male character are "touching each other a lot. [The other actor] completely understands that that can't happen," Stanleigh said.

Pushover Productions is funded "with great difficulty" by private donors.

"Hopefully soon we'll be able to apply for different grants," Rabinovitch said, "but it's difficult when your company doesn't have a lot of experience."

Rabinovitch said creating Pushover Productions "was one of the most satisfying things I've ever done in my life."

Antigone runs June 15, 16, 17 at 8 p.m and June 20 at 2 p.m and 8 p.m. at The Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St. (one block east of Bathurst Street, south of King Street). All tickets are $12, available at the door, or call TicketLine at 416-366-7723 ext. 290 or visit www.stlc.com/artword/artword.php.

Seniors gain computer skills at Wagman Centre

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More and more cyber bubbies and zaides are surfing the web, sending and receiving e-mails, creating websites and playing computer games – and many can thank the Wagman Centre for helping them become computer literate.

The Wagman Centre, part of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, began its computer classes five years ago with one class and four computers donated by Henry Campbell.

Thanks to a donation of additional computers, as well as printers and scanners, from the Goldgrub family last year, the centre's computer room now has 11 computers and has expanded its schedule of classes and labs.

The sessions run throughout the week for seniors at different levels of proficiency.

"We share the excitement of our students when they communicate with family and friends – seeing pictures of their grandchildren, watching them search the web, and when they learn a new recreational activity," says Mara Swartz, Wagman's recreation co-ordinator.

She says participants tell her the computer courses have helped them "bridge the generation gap. They tell me they can communicate with grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and they can talk to them about computers. But most important, it avoids loneliness."

About 80 per cent of the students now own a computer, Swartz notes.

To assist students with physical problems, the lab has special equipment, including a stationary mouse for people with tremors or arthritis and a video projection machine to help students see what is being taught.

Swartz says each student has a program skills sheet that tracks their progress and helps them move forward.

This spring's roster includes eight-week sessions for beginners that provide basic computer and word processing skills; second-level beginners classes that aim to increase word processing skills; intermediate level sessions that introduce the Microsoft Word program; a four-week course titled "Design your Own Personal Stationery and Business Cards;" and an eight-week Internet course.

Silver took computer training when she worked for the provincial Ministry of Correctional Services. She retired in 1996. Three years ago, she noticed on the Baycrest website that the centre offered computer courses for seniors.

"I wondered if they needed volunteers for the program."

Lawrence Sandy, 89, began learning about computers six months ago after his children gave him one as a gift.

"I'm having a lot of fun," he says. "I just finished the Internet course and I want to continue learning. My main interest is the Internet, and I now keep in touch with my family. I was thrilled to get pictures of my great-granddaughter, who is in Hanson, Texas."

Al Thuna, 69, retired nine months ago. An avid stamp collector, he uses the Internet and e-mail to search for different suppliers and to keep in touch with other collectors.

Harry Finkelstein, 56, was forced to retire a year ago from his work as a sportswear wholesaler because of illness. He had used a computer at home, but he wanted to create a website. After taking classes, he designed his own site: www.harrykel.netfirms.com.

Cost for the computer courses are $40 for Wagman Centre members and $60 for non-members. Computer lab time is $5 an hour for members and $7 for non-members.

For more information on the classes and the computer room, call Mara Swartz at 416-785-2500, ext. 2275.

YOU'RE PAYING TOO MUCH TAX.

"I believe in a Canada that rewards hard work, respects taxpayers, and helps those in need. I believe in a government that is accountable and works for the interests of all Canadians."

Stephen Harper

Wasteful spending. An unnecessary long-gun registry. A Sponsorship Program that lined their friends' pockets with millions of dollars. Somebody has to pay for it and that somebody is you. In fact, ten years of Liberal government have left Canada as one of the highest taxed nations in the world.

A Conservative government will reduce personal and business income taxes and introduce a tax deduction for every child under 16.

Youngest candidate seeking seat in Toronto riding

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Max Silverman, 18, is the youngest candidate in the June 28 federal election, his website touts. The NDP hopeful in Toronto's Eglinton-Lawrence riding is hoping to unseat veteran Liberal MP Joe Volpe, who has represented the district since 1988 and has served as minister of human resources and skills development since December, when he was asked by Prime Minister Paul Martin to be the lead minister for Ontario.

Eglinton-Lawrence

Also running in the riding are Bernie Tanz for the Conservatives; Shel Goldstein for the Green Party; and Corinne Prevost for the Canadian Action Party.

Volpe, 56, an Italian-born former educator who was raised in Jewish neighbourhoods in Toronto, won the riding handily in the 2000 election with 60 per cent of the vote.

Max Silverman

Eglinton-Lawrence is bounded by Yonge Street and the railway tracks west of Caledonia Road. Highway 401 is its northern boundary, and the southern boundary runs along Eglinton Avenue West.

Volpe believes the top issue in this election, simply, is "who will be Canada's prime minister." Despite media reports indicating depressed support for Martin, Volpe said that while campaigning, he has found, "without a doubt, overwhelming" support for the Liberal leader.

Bernie Tanz

Given the demographics of Eglinton-Lawrence – with Jews constituting about one-third of its 106,879 residents and a sizeable Orthodox community in the Bathurst-Lawrence neighbourhood – Volpe stressed the party's support for Israel in areas such as commerce and scientific research.

Joseph Volpe

Canada's recent voting record on Israel-related matters in the United Nations "has to be changed, for sure," said Volpe, a member of the Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, an official caucus committee.

A longtime advocate of government support for religious schools, he said the issue of tuition tax credits "requires some federal involvement." He sees anti-Semitism and hate crimes as not just a Jewish issue but a national one, and said anti-Semitism must be addressed aggressively in its early stages.

Health care, also of particular concern to the riding's significant population of seniors, will be addressed in August, Volpe said, when the prime minister is planning to meet with the provinces about an additional $9 billion dollars that he has promised for health care

"We want to tie that to a performance criterion that will address how to reduce the waiting times and provide greater accessibility," Volpe said.

On the issue of same-sex marriage, he defers to Canada's Supreme Court, which has yet to rule on the issue.

Tanz, 47, agrees with Volpe on same-sex marriage, but he said that in his forays into the riding, where four generations of his family live, he's encountered concerns over government accountability.

"People feel their money is not being safeguarded by the existing Liberal government," he said. "The cost of living is a big, big issue."

One way he would address that is by fighting for the tax deductibility of mortgages, he said.

But the main reason Tanz took on the candidacy was funding for religious schools. A father of three children in the Jewish day school system, Tanz, a shopping centre developer, said he would call for the reinstatement of the religious education tax credit by the Ontario government. The measure was eliminated this year by Premier Dalton McGuinty.

Among the issues he's stressing is crime. "We've got to set examples of some type of mandatory sentencing with respect to hate crimes. They cannot be tolerated."

An active member of the Progressive Conservative party for the past decade, Tanz ran for East York council in 1994, losing by only 67 votes. He serves on the advisory board of the Tanz Neuroscience Centre at the University of Toronto, named in memory of his grandmother, and was involved in Bialik Hebrew Day School's capital campaign.

He declined to comment on whether the Conservative party has been a true merger of the former Progressive Conservative and Alliance parties, saying that it's more "a matter of going forward." He said party leader Stephen Harper is "a moderate man, a good man. He says what he means and means what he says. I think he's… a terrific leader for the party."

Federal Election '04

Silverman, a Grade 12 student at Northern Secondary School, was an active member of Jewish Youth Against the Occupation until his recent candidacy, and he co-organized a march against racism in April.

Although he tried (unsuccessfully) to have the controversial film Jenin, Jenin screened at his high school last year – and two years ago stirred up controversy at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for wearing a button that advocated ending Israel's occupation and supporting the intifadah (he told The CJN he covered up the latter part of the slogan) – Silverman said he's dedicated to Israel, which he has visited with his family. He added that he works at Camp George, which is affiliated with the Reform movement, and teaches Hebrew at Temple Sinai.

He admits to encountering "differences of opinion" with voters while campaigning in the riding.

Silverman, who supports same-sex civil marriage, but is not in favour of funding for private schools, said he rejects violence and believes in a two-state solution in Israel. He believes the best way to fight international terrorism is to support development to try to alleviate poverty.

He is focusing on three main election issues: keeping health care delivery in the public domain; creating a "green" (environmentally sustainable) economy; and strengthening Canada's voice for peace, human rights and fair trade on the world stage.

If elected, he said, he would defer his acceptance at McGill University, where he is planning to study politics and history.

Federal Election '04

Health care the key issue among major candidates

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As Carolyn Bennett sees it, the most crucial issues in this federal election are health care, health care and health care.

The Liberal incumbent in the Toronto riding of St. Paul's says that in every neighbourhood in the riding, voters are talking about the health care system.

St. Paul's

"They want to make sure it is sustainable," says Bennett, a family physician. "In conversations I had with people, I saw that they understood the link between [such issues] as poverty and violence and health care. It is all about keeping people well.

"People accuse me of making everything a health care issue, but it is all linked."

Bennett, considered a strong friend of the Jewish community and an advocate for Israel (she chairs the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group), was first elected in the riding, long viewed as a federal bellwether, in 1997 and re-elected in 2000.

In late 2003, she was named minister of state for Public Health by Prime Minister Paul Martin.

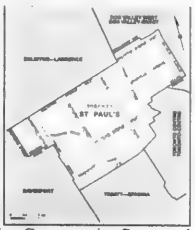
Her affluent riding, which according to the 2001 census has the second highest average family income in Canada, is bounded, roughly, by the CP Rail line, Winona Drive, east to Dufferin Street, Eglinton Avenue, Bayview Avenue and Moore Avenue.

Almost 37 per cent of the 112,500 residents have university degrees, the third highest percentage in Canada, and the riding is estimated to be 20 per cent Jewish, with the largest concentration of Jews living in the Forest Hill and Rosedale neighbourhoods.

The riding is almost completely residential, and renters outnumber homeowners 62 per cent to 38 per cent. The business service industry is the major employer.

Bennett is striving to promote multicultural dialogue in St. Paul's. "If we cannot promote that here, what hope do we have in the Middle East?" she asks.

At one town hall meeting, she encouraged new Canadians to speak about what it was like for them to come to Canada. "We must foster a safe place for people to tell their stories. At least we have made a good start in promoting dialogue.



"The thing people need to understand is that for the Jewish community, the Middle East is not foreign policy, it is family. It is heartfelt by Jews that Israel be secure and safe."

Barry Cline, an architect who ran against Bennett in the 2000 federal election for the Progressive Conservative Party and polled 10,000 votes, or 21 per cent of ballots cast, is the new Conservative Party's hopeful in St. Paul's.

He said health care is definitely a major issue, "but everyone is looking for government accountability and they are not finding it. Health care comes up after they vent their frustrations about what is going on now in the government, and I am talking about everyone, from young voters to seniors living in retirement homes," he says.

"A vision of accountability is sweeping the land. People are saying that 'we are Canadian, and we must have integrity.'"

Among other issues, he said, a Conservative government would ensure transparency and accuracy by providing the auditor general with full access to all documents from all federal organizations, encourage research and development through tax credits and elimination of the capital tax, and eliminate inter-provincial trade barriers in commerce, labour and capital mobility.

It would also end mandatory retirement and introduce measures to hold young lawbreakers accountable to their victims and the larger community.

Cline says he's a strong supporter of Israel, and would not be associated with the Conservatives if the party did not share his views on the subject.

NDP candidate Norman Tobias, a tax lawyer who taught law at Queen's University, says his party's platform calls for restored funding for health care.

"Federal funding has fallen to 16 per cent of health care costs, and it should be at least 25 per cent.

"We also need to address the issue of affordable housing. Between 1973 and 1993, 650,000 units were constructed, but that program was cancelled and it has not been restored."

His party's platform includes upgrading public transit, creating 200,000 more child care spaces in the next 10 years and extended health care coverage for seniors to include home care and pharmacare.

"We would also exempt people with an income of less than $5,000 from federal income tax, and increase child tax benefit from just shy of $2,000 to $4,900.

"We think that we have to start with the most vulnerable. Our neighbours can have claim to dignity only when we believe in community."

Addressing the Arab-Israeli dispute, Tobias said his party calls for "an immediate end to terrorism, leading to negotiations towards a Palestinian state living peacefully alongside the State of Israel without any further claims against Israel."

The Green Party candidate in St. Paul's is Peter Elgie.

Nearly 1,500 WWII war crimes files closed, inactive

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

As of December, 2003, the Department of Justice had declared 1,494 files on suspected World War II-era war criminals either inactive or closed, according to the government's recently released Sixth Annual Report on Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes.

Seventy files were still under active investigation and 124 allegations had undergone initial checks. Of the active files, four involved ongoing proceedings at the Federal Court of Canada or the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB). The rest are described as in the "development stage."

Of the 373 inactive files, the greatest number – 227 – were listed as such because the suspects were accused of "membership only." Denise Rudnicki. a spokesperson for Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, explained that "membership only" means the person was a member of a group that "may or may not have been involved in [war] crimes. If it's a murder squad, it's clear, but other groups are a little grey as to whether they committed atrocities."

Other explanations for inactive files included insufficient evidence and suspects not being in Canada. Another 175 were inactive because "routine" investigative checks came up negative.

Of the 930 files that are closed, 508 were closed prior to 1998 (when the War Crimes Program was created), 408 were because the suspect was deceased, and another 14 were dropped because the suspect was born before 1906.

The report was made public last month by Cotler and Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan, the minister of public safety and emergency preparedness.

It highlights the activities of the War Crimes Program from April 1, 2002, to March 31, 2003, in pursuing war criminals and those who have committed crimes against humanity, both during World War II and after the war up to the current day.

All told, the Canadian government has opened and examined 1,684 files on alleged World War II criminals.

Since 1995, 19 revocation and deportation cases have been initiated, the report states. As of March 31, 2003, the government had received favourable decisions in six denaturalization cases before the Federal Court, namely, those against Wasily Bogutin, Vladimir Katriuk, Serge Kisluk, Helmut Oberlander, Wasyl Odynsky and Michael Baumgartner.

In two other cases, those of Ladislaus Csatary and Mamertas Maciukas, the respondents did not contest the cases. Their citizenship was revoked and they left the country voluntarily.

Three defendants – Peteris Vitols, Johann Dueck and Eduards Podins – have been successful in three cases before the Federal Court.

Six suspects died during the course of legal proceedings: Antanas Kenstavicius, Erichs Tobiass, Josef Nemsila, Ludwig Nebel, Bogutin and Kisluk.

On March 31, 2003, the department was awaiting one judicial review decision from the Federal Court, that in the case against Oberlander. Deportation proceedings were also pending against Oberlander before the IRB's adjudication division.

Two cases were concluded and awaiting a decision from the Federal Court, those against Walter Obodzinsky and Jacob Fast. Proceedings are ongoing in the denaturalization case against Michael Seifert. Extradition proceedings have also been launched against Seifert.

Obodzinsky was notified in August 1999 that his citizenship was to be revoked. He then went to the Federal Court for adjudication under the Citizenship Act. A statement of claim was issued against and served on Obodzinsky on Feb. 1, 2000. The Federal Court's trial division and the Federal Court of Appeal both dismissed his request to stay the case on medical grounds and the Supreme Court denied him leave to appeal on this issue.

In the case of Fast, he was served with a notice of intent to revoke his citizenship on Sept. 30, 1999. Fast requested that the matter be referred to the Federal Court, also citing the Citizenship Act. A statement of claim was served on Fast's counsel on March 7, 2000.

The report notes that the War Crimes Program continues to deal with allegations that could lead to criminal prosecution or to the revocation of citizenship and eventual removal, "notwithstanding the passage of time that renders this work more and more difficult."

In releasing the report, Cotler said: "Canada has a reputation worldwide for being a leader in ensuring that there is no safe haven for individuals involved in crimes against humanity or war crimes, regardless of when or where these crimes took place.

"We want to take a leadership role in engaging the international community to work even more closely with us to bring the perpetrators to justice."

The War Crimes Program is a joint initiative of the departments of justice and citizenship and immigration, and the RCMP.

Eric Vernon, director of government relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the number of active cases is "disappointingly low, but we do acknowledge that in the last few years more cases have been brought forward by the government."

He said that "there had been quite a lull in the middle history" of the revamped war crimes program, which was established in 1995 after the government switched to pursuing suspects under civil, rather than criminal, law.

He noted that since the period covered by the report, two new cases have been launched, those against Jura Skomatchuk and Josef Furman, which he said CJC commends.

Vernon said CJC would like to see the government consider using criminal proceedings again, which was made possible by legislation enacted in 2001 in the wake of the establishment of the International Criminal Court.

Ten Haligonians celebrate their bat mitzvahs

By JOEL JACOBSON
Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — It will be a magical ride for 10 local women this Shabbat when they take a step most Jewish girls in non-Orthodox North American synagogues take at age 12 or 13.

They will become b'not mitzvah.

For various reasons, these women, aged 29 to 74, missed the experience the first time around.

Some grew up in Orthodox shuls, where girls are not called to the Torah like bar mitzvah boys, while some came from non-practicing families and some were not Jewish at the time.

Now they're ready, willing and able.

They've been studying each week at the Conservative and egalitarian Shaar Shalom Synagogue for two years, initially as part of an adult education program to teach liturgy and understanding of the prayers, and more recently to celebrate their bat mitzvahs.

Florie Fineberg, 74, the oldest of the group, grew up in Montreal, where her family did not attend synagogue regularly. When she moved to Halifax, her husband Leonard's hometown, the people of Shaar Shalom became like a second family to her.

As she became older, she says, she realized what she had missed as a girl.

"I have learned a lot over the years," says Fineberg, the shul's choir director. "And this, too, is an important learning experience."

As b'not mitzvah, the women will be able to lead religious services.

Molly Rechnitzer, 68, a Montreal native who moved to Halifax years ago, says leading Shabbat services is part of the commitment the women made when they decided to pursue adult studies.

"I attend services each Friday evening and Saturday morning. I can read and write [Hebrew], but studying for my bat mitzvah has taught me why I'm saying the prayers I recite," says Rechnitzer, a social worker in private practice.

Donna Assh, a psychologist, grew up in Quebec City. As chair of Shaar Shalom's adult education committee, she helped create the group.

"I've always had a strong sense of being Jewish," says Donna. "But in the [Orthodox] synagogue where I grew up, women did not have an active role in services. Now, being able to participate more will cause me to show my Judiasm more directly."

Elizabeth Pink, a justice of the peace who converted to Judiasm several years ago, sees this as an opportunity to give back to the synagogue.

"We do not have a rabbi, and the undue burden of leading services and performing synagogue duties has fallen to a few men. Now I'll be able to help out."

Joanna Mirsky-Wexler, 29, director of finance at the Atlantic Jewish Council, is the youngest of the group.

In her Orthodox synagogue in Montreal, as in most Orthodox shuls, girls did not celebrate bat mitzvahs.

> 'Makes me feel more responsible for my choices as a spiritual and ethical person'

"Now my spiritual growth has developed to explore, take leadership and learn the liturgy, which is what Judaism is all about. What better way to explore than in the community of women about to have a bat mitzvah. I'm now ready for what I wasn't at age 13."

Michelle Byers, a professor of sociology and criminology at Saint Mary's University (SMU), grew up in a non-shul-going family in Montreal. When she moved to Halifax, she found Shaar Shalom welcoming and now attends regularly.

"As an academic, it was easy to learn [to read and understand Hebrew] fast, even starting from zero. Being bat mitzvah makes me feel more responsible for my choices as a spiritual and ethical person, makes me think about things and make informed decisions."

Wendy Katz, an English professor at SMU; Beverly Parsons, a retired registered nurse; and marketing consultant Linda Law, both of whom converted to Judiasm, are also in the group.

Heather Zitner, a family doctor and medical advisor to the provincial Workmen's Compensation Board, says Judaism is "a way of life I've practised for a long time [after converting].

"I made my kids go through this. They'll probably giggle at me Saturday."

The women will lead services from start to finish, sometimes as a group, sometimes individually. They'll also read the weekly Torah portion.

Of that, Michelle Byers says proudly: "My dad and brother didn't have a bar mitzvah. I'm the first in my immediate family to be able to celebrate this. And they'll be here Saturday to see me."

Ex-PLO member turned Zionist barred from Canada

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — An ex-PLO terrorist turned supporter of Israel who has made numerous appearances in Canada was barred from re-entering the country last week to give a speech here denouncing terror, but he managed to deliver his talk via satellite from California.

Walid Shoebat was scheduled to speak in Vancouver about Islamic fanaticism and terror, but he was stopped by immigration officials last Monday as he boarded a flight to Vancouver from a California airport, after his Canadian entry visa failed to arrive.

He told the Vancouver Sun the officials "gave me some excuse that I have a background in terrorism."

Shoebat, who grew up in a village near Bethlehem and now lives in northern California, has already been warmly welcomed in recent months by Jewish audiences across North America, including in Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal.

His Vancouver talk at the Italian Cultural Centre to a crowd of 400 Jews, Christians and a number of anti-Zionists went on as scheduled live via video link.

Gabriel Patrich, a member of the local Israel Action Committee, told the Sun he was "very disappointed" by the decision not to let Shoebat into the country and accused the Canadian government of "taking sides."

A spokesperson for Shoebat told Israel's Arutz Sheva radio that pressure from pro-Palestinian activists in Vancouver, who had organized a protest outside the Italian centre, led to Shoebat's being refused entry.

Canadian immigration department officials reportedly declined comment.

Shoebat's formative years were defined by the belief that Jews were the descendants of monkeys and pigs, but the 44-year-old father of two has given up his day job as a software engineer to tour North America, speaking at churches, synagogues and community centres about Islamic fanaticism and terror.

Shoebat, who converted to Christianity in 1993, spoke last week as someone who had been immersed in Islamic fundamentalism and experienced life as a terrorist.

"Hatred is a drug, a new kind of epidemic, and you fight drugs with detox," he said. "You also get angry at the people who have pushed this poison into you. I'm now trying to detox others and to fight the epidemic of Islamic religious extremism."

Given his background, Shoebat, which is not his real name but one assumed for his protection, seemed an unlikely candidate for detoxification.

By age eight, he was throwing rocks at people praying at the Western Wall. By 15, he was in a Jerusalem prison, where the PLO recruited him to blow up the Bethlehem branch of Bank Leumi. The plan went awry when Shoebat saw Arab children playing nearby and decided not to detonate his explosives. At 18 he moved to Chicago, where he raised funds for the PLO.

Ultimately, he married a Catholic, and in the process of trying to convert her to Islam, started researching the Qur'an and the Old Testament.

"I became convinced I was on the side of evil," said Shoebat, who is now an active Christian Zionist.

"I started looking into Judeo-Christian texts, and I found that the things I had been taught were wrong," he said.

Shoebat believes the only answer to the gridlock in the Middle East is for Israel to dismantle the infrastructure of the Islamic fundamentalists from the ground up, starting with the education system.

"When you're born, the first thing you learn is that Jews are dogs – it's institutionalized in the arts, social life and schools. The whole education system is hijacked, not unlike the indoctrination that occurred in Nazi Germany. It's an occupation of the mind," he said.

"This is a vermin that needs to be destroyed. Not just the terrorists, but their agenda."

Shoebat's views and his willingness to share them has left him estranged from much of his family, and he receives regular threats and says he never feels safe.

He can also never return to Bethlehem. "When Israeli television broadcast an interview with me, my whole town was watching. If I returned, I'd be killed in five minutes," he said.

"I'm the perfect subject for an honour killing, and my Arab family would be glad to do the job. When I was a terrorist, I was called a freedom fighter. Now I'm called a racist and a traitor."

In response to one questioner who insisted that Israel is similar to an apartheid state, Shoebat answered: "A Jew cannot walk in Judea, but an Arab can walk free in Israel. That's a litmus test for the whole world."

Ottawa community demonstrates solidarity with Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For the first time in a number of years, the weather co-operated, so the organizers of the annual Aviv Festival could relax and enjoy the fruits of their labour.

Previously known as the UJA Walkathon, the event's format has evolved into what this year was more of a solidarity march than endurance test. Whereas in past years participants started at various times and did the course walking, running, cycling or even on inline roller skates, this year's version saw everyone begin at once. As a group and carrying banners, they walked together down Broadview Avenue and back to the city's Jewish Community Campus to participate in a variety of activities.

Ottawa mayor Bob Chiarelli demonstrated his support by beginning the May 30 walk with the group, as did Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon. Several local political candidates were also spotted in the crowd.

Former deputy prime minister Herb Gray enjoyed the day with his family. "I wanted to show solidarity with the Ottawa Jewish community," he said. "Over the years, I have been part of the Windsor community, and now that I am based in Ottawa, I wanted to participate in this. It is a tremendous event."

Dalhousie University student Mark Bessoudo of Saint John, N.B., is in Ottawa for a co-op work term. He said he came out to show support for Israel.

"It's amazing how many people are here," he said, "And the food is good."

Indeed, the food tent proved very popular throughout the day. There were also numerous children's activities and an Israeli marketplace with arts and crafts vendors.

Marty Davis, director of the United Jewish Appeal, said "the only cloudy part of the day was that some of our vendors were unable to cross the border at Buffalo." He said that while it was disappointing, it was not a complete surprise that people from the Middle East would have difficulty at the border.

Other popular activities included a dunk tank where prominent community members volunteered to get wet; Israeli dancing on the lawn; and entertainment by a number of local choirs.

With a record turnout, it's expected the event will be also be a fundraising success.

Jewish MP's posters defaced with swastikas

MONTREAL — Longueuil police are investigating the daubing with swastikas of election posters of Brossard-La Prairie Liberal MP Jacques Saada.

Saada, who is the government house leader, reported that the defaced posters were found on Provencher Boulevard in Brossard.

The same weekend, The CJN also spotted at least two of his ground-level posters scrawled with "voleurs" (thieves) on Plamondon Street in Brossard.

Saada, 57, who is Jewish, described the swastika daubings as "extremely sad" and "a direct attack on who we are and what we are. This is not acceptable and it's very disturbing."

First elected in the South Shore riding in 1997, Saada also complained of anti-Semitic graffiti on his posters during the 2000 election campaign. In April, shortly after the United Talmud Torahs firebombing, he revealed that he had received a number of menacing anti-Semitic letters and phone calls over the previous months.

He said at the time that it reminded him of the problems faced by Jews while he was growing up in Tunisia. Saada emigrated to Quebec in 1969.

Quebec City cemetery vandalized

QUEBEC CITY — About 20 headstones at the Beth Israel cemetery in Quebec City were overturned last week over a two-day period.

Police were investigating, but did not know whether the vandalism was a random act or motivated by anti-Semtism.

There was no defacing of the stones. Police had no suspects or witnesses.

"It is too early to link these facts with the fact the cemetery is Jewish," Const. Jean Minguy told the CBC.

Quebec City's small Jewish community is shocked, said member Simon Jacobs. "To hear that the cemetery has been vandalized in a small community like Quebec, one wonders why," he told CBC.

The Jewish cemetery, which has been vandalized in the past, is about 150 years old and has been declared a national historic site.

Winnipeg CJA launches endowment fund

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal has launched a new endowment fund and less than a month after its April 28 startup, the Leave More Than Memories Combined Jewish Appeal Endowment Fund received its first bequest.

"We have 40 to 50 others who have expressed interest in leaving bequests," says Barry Shenkarow, who is chairing the new fund. He declined to specify the amount of the first bequest.

"We are rounding up names of people who might consider leaving bequests, and we are getting people to think about the fund when they are planning their estates."

CJA has raised record levels of money over the past three campaigns, but the financial needs of the community's beneficiary agencies continue to grow. And every year, Shenkarow says, people leave the community or pass away. An endowment fund, he says, means gifts to the community are there in perpetuity.

"This endowment fund will give our community the opportunity to ensure we can continue to operate well into the future, no matter how much our population may fluctuate up or down," says federation president Neil Duboff.

"It will also allow current donors to continue supporting the community far into the future."

Shenkarow says CJA hopes the new endowment fund will be able to emulate the success of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, which was was started by three businessmen nearly 50 years ago and now has a principal of $46 million.

The interest earned now comes to more than $1 million annually, which goes toward more than 100 non-profit organizations in the Jewish and general community, both in Winnipeg and Israel.

The Jewish Foundation will be administering the new CJA fund. "We hope that in 10 to 15 years, we will also have a substantial amount of interest to contribute to the annual CJA campaign," Shenkarow says.

While all interest from bequests to the new fund will go to the CJA campaign, donors will be able to leave up to 50 per cent of the interest on their gifts to specific community beneficiaries, with the rest to be directed to general CJA campaign funds.

Most mega-donors have supported Jewish causes have a positive association in terms of demonstrating leadership. "You're willing to identify yourself with a particular cause and, by extension, showing that other people should follow you. I don't view prestige, by definition, as negative."

To the best of Marker's knowledge, Jewish mega-donors have all supported established Jewish causes, but, with exceptions like Birthright Israel, he said, they did not find them to be the most exciting thing they were involved in.

How can Jewish organizations attract new donors? Not by making people feel guilty, Marker stressed. Guilt might work briefly, after an anti-Semitic incident or a crisis in Israel, he said. But, he added, for the philanthropic dollars to flow in, the community needs innovative responses that involve people in a way that is exciting to them.

Marker believes the Canadian Jewish community, compared to its U.S. counterpart, feels a greater sense of responsibility to support established Jewish organizations, and to see "a central planning process" (or community umbrella) as a primary recipient for their philanthropy.

Among adults in their 20s, 30s and early 40s, there is less of an "automatic obligation" to support Jewish causes, Marker believes. "The next generation will be supporting Jewish causes that they feel speak directly to their own interests, and that's the characteristic change of philanthropy, Jewish or otherwise."

In that age group, he said, donors are "very heavily motivated by personal involvement and the feeling their dollars are making a difference. They're less committed to general kinds of charitable giving, such as United Way and the federation, [but] it doesn't mean they're less generous."

The trend to give increasingly to secular causes began about a generation ago, Marker said. Now, some of the largest individualized gifts are going to non-Jewish causes, he noted.

Even so, the total number of philanthropic dollars going to Jewish causes is bigger than ever, he said. "There is more disposable money, and people are giving to a larger range of institutions."

He believes the onus is on Jewish leaders, not on the philanthropists, to reassess their own roles.

Jewish philanthropy, "in general, is still very strong," says Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Last year's UJA campaign raised almost $58 million, a record in the organization's history. "Federations have, by and large, more than held their own. It's a much more competitive market, but they've done very well."

According to the Tobin report, Jews are giving more dollars than before to both secular and Jewish causes, but the number of donors to federation campaigns has been declining. Tobin notes that Jewish identity is highly correlated with giving to Jewish philanthropies.

There are no hard statistics on Canadian Jewish philanthropy, said Sokolsky, but "intuitively I find [the American data] very relevant." In Toronto, the pool of donors has not decreased, but it is also not growing, he said. The number of donors relative to the Jewish population – which has increased – has gone down, he added.

For the most part, the "gigantic mega-gifts" – more than $10 million – aren't finding their way to Jewish causes, said Sokolsky, but he noted that cumulative yearly gifts from major donors may add up to comparable amounts. Major Jewish gifts are more likely to be directed toward "big ideas," he said.

"We as a community have not been assertive enough in creating those big ideas. Where we have, we've been extraordinarily successful," he said, citing as examples the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), an initiative aimed at strengthening the day school movement in North America, and Birthright Israel, the initiative of megadonors Michael Steinhardt and Charles Bronfman, which provides a free trip to Israel for young Jewish adults between the ages of 18 and 26.

Perhaps the ultimate big idea was the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, Sokolsky suggested. "The outpouring of support for that was a response to a big, bold idea. It's pretty hard to come up with an idea as big as that."

On a more local scale, the federation's current Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) initiative is also a big-idea project, in that the federation is "trying to capture the imagination of new philanthropists," Sokolsky said. The initiative involves the development of three major Jewish "campuses": the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life and the Nadal JCC downtown, the Bathurst Jewish Centre/Lipa Green Building complex in the north part of the city, and a new multi-purpose campus in Richmond Hill, scheduled to open in 2006 when its first building, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is expected to be finished.

To critics who question whether the money being raised for JTT should be directed at Jewish education, Sokolsky says spending money on buildings and spending money on Jewish education, which receives $11 million a year from the federation (almost $9 million of which subsidizes tuition fees), are not mutually exclusive. Most day schools, he noted, are close to capacity. To house more students, he said, "we're going to have to build schools."

JTT has attracted large capital gifts, and the major JTT donors have increased their annual UJA donations, he noted. "We're turning on another generation, and engaging a lot of new people in the project.

"The next generation is much more hands-on and more entrepreneurial," Sokolsky said. "They don't take for granted the institutions their parents supported. Those institutions have to re-earn the trust and interest of the next generation."

Russell Goldstein, a 33-year-old marketing services consultant, represents the younger generation of UJA donor. A co-chair of Atid (the Hebrew word for "future"), a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto leadership development group established in 1997 to introduce the under-35 generation to the federation's work, Goldstein got his own start at its inception. It was his father David's idea to start the group.

David, who was campaign chair at the time, said there are always concerns about the younger generation drifting away. "What you have to do is educate them. Everyone gives because of [what they feel] inside. I think it gets very personal." Part of that, he noted, can also be the social aspect of working with others and becoming friends.

While he also supports public institutions such as universities and hospitals, David said he feels a moral obligation to look after fellow Jews. Being involved in Jewish causes, for him, is one way of following in his parents' footsteps. His late father, Albert, was involved in fundraising for Knesseth Israel Synagogue (the Junction Shul). "He was not in a position to be one of the top givers, but he did his part," said David.

Only some Atid members have parents who are major donors, said Russell, but all are considered "high-potential leaders of the future."

'I believe every generation gets better'

Of the 40 or so who started out with him in Atid, he said most are now involved in federation leadership positions.

For Russell, the main issue is creating awareness about the work the federation does, and how to get involved in it. "UJA is a huge organization. They support a lot of different organizations. It's hard to tie it back to one cause, because it's an umbrella organization. I don't think that [my generation is] necessarily aware of what the needs are. I think [federation leaders] need to do a better job explaining who they support. Funds going to Israel is [just] a piece of it."

A cause like breast cancer research has higher visibility and also a higher perceived immediacy, he pointed out.

Russell, who has also been involved with United Way and the Family Abuse Crisis Exchange, said he and his wife support about eight charitable organizations, half a dozen of which are secular. The couple decides as a team which causes to support.

Lawrence Bloomberg, 62, radiates confidence about the future of philanthropy in general and within the Jewish community specifically. "I believe that every generation gets better," said the co-chair of Mount Sinai Hospital's Best Medicine Campaign – one of the largest campaigns to date in a medical institution in Canada, and a co-chair 10 years ago of the annual UJA campaign. "Our society keeps moving forward, so why shouldn't our children be even better at philanthropy than we are?"

From a Jewish perspective, Bloomberg – who sponsors an annual lecture by a Jewish author at Holy Blossom Temple, has also funded a chair in accountancy at Concordia University, and was named outstanding volunteer of 2003 by the Association of Fundraising Professionals – believes Jewish people "understand their responsibilities to the community at large, but most understand that we are a minority and that it's important to prioritize support for our community."

Bloomberg does not see a major difference between his generation and that of his parents in terms of giving to the greater community.

He does note a difference between Canada and the United States, however. "I think in Canada giving and philanthropy haven't been celebrated to the extent they have in the United States," he said. "American philanthropists, probably because they were wealthier and there were more of them, have played a much greater role in their society than Canadian philanthropists have done in our society, but I think that is changing. I think the number of wealthy Canadians and the size of their wealth is making them able to be larger philanthropists than in the past.

> 'As Canadians see what Americans are doing, and as some step up in Canada to make very large gifts, it sets examples for others'

"As Canadians see what Americans are doing, and as some step up in Canada to make very large gifts, it sets examples for others. We have always seen gifts in the millions. Now we're seeing them in the tens of millions."

In both the Jewish and the secular world in Canada, the bar is being raised, Bloomberg said.

A father of three grown children, Bloomberg said they support both Jewish causes and those in the broader community.

Referring to the trend to increasingly larger donations, Bloomberg noted that "a focused gift [to one organization] has a better chance of creating change than supporting many things in a smaller way. If there's something important that has to get done and your gift can make a difference, I think that's very exciting… It's more fun, because you can create change."

Large gifts are key to successful fundraising campaigns, said Bloomberg. "You have to have those philanthropists who are in a position to support the institution, support it in a major way, [because] that creates incentive for others to do the same." In most campaigns, he added, 60 to 80 per cent of the funds come from a relatively small percentage of givers.

Barry Sherman, also 62, gave the largest mega-gift to federation in 2002, when he and his wife Honey donated $50 million to its foundation, half in the form of a bequest. More recently, he gave $25 million for the JTT project, above and beyond his annual UJA donation, which is the largest of its kind.

Outside of the Jewish community, Sherman's largest donations have been to educational institutions and health-care facilities, several in the order of $5 or $6 million, but none approaching the amounts he has given to the federation.

"I haven't had the capacity to do all that much except in recent years," he noted. "I try to do what makes sense. Life is short, and you can't take it with you."

He believes that for his four children, who range in age from 13 to 28, philanthropy will follow once they are established business-wise.

Factors like excitement and prestige apparently don't play a role for Sherman, who is chair and CEO of the pharmaceutical company Apotex, Inc. "Those things don't interest me. I just try to put my money where I think it will help the most people, with the Jewish community coming first."

With the current situation in Israel and a need for new infrastructure in the Toronto area, the needs within the Jewish community are "unprecedented," said Sherman.

Israeli cabinet approves Sharon's plan

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza withdrawal plan overcame a key hurdle with its passage in the Israeli cabinet this week, but there are more obstacles ahead.

The version of the plan the cabinet approved by a vote of 14 to 7 on Sunday was a withdrawal in principle, but the cabinet did not vote on actually dismantling any Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip or West Bank.

"Israel is taking its future in its own hands," Sharon said after the vote. "Israel has no intention of waiting any longer for the Palestinians to rein in terror and incitement."

Coincidentally, the vote came on the anniversary of two landmark Middle East events in which Sharon played a pivotal role: the beginning of the 1967 Six Day War's ground campaign and Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

Immediately after the vote, Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he would order the Israel Lands Authority to freeze any new requests for Jewish settlement construction in the Gaza Strip.

But even the compromise plan approved Sunday, which was worked out in recent days after a more comprehensive pullout plan appeared likely to lose a vote, was difficult to achieve.

The measure passed only after days of wrangling and a drawn-out cabinet meeting.

Last Friday, Sharon fired two members of his cabinet who had strongly opposed the plan, Tourism Minister Benny Elon and Transportation Minister Avigdor Lieberman, both from the National Union Party. Their dismissals helped to ensure the plan had majority support in the cabinet.

Cabinet opposition had also come from Sharon's fellow Likud members, especially Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Education Minister Limor Livnat.

To mollify these "rebel ministers," Sharon diluted the plan, eventually limiting the vote to the notion that Israel should disengage from the Palestinians in principle. No actual vote was taken on whether Israel should evacuate the 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank that Sharon had specified in his original disengagement plan.

Sharon also had to include a last-minute compromise regarding a letter of understanding he had exchanged with President George W. Bush on the disengagement plan. The letters were referred to in the plan that was approved, but they were not appended to the plan itself, as Sharon had originally wanted.

Ariel Sharon

Sharon had hoped to clinch support for the plan after Bush endorsed it in April.

At the time, Bush said Israel had the right to retain some West Bank land in a future peace deal with the Palestinians and that Palestinian refugees from Israel's 1948 War of Independence should not be granted the right to return to their former homes inside Israel.

But inside Israel, Sharon's plan ran into trouble in early May when it was rejected by Likud's membership in a party referendum.

Despite the difficulties, Sharon was optimistic after Sunday's cabinet vote, which came after opinion polls showed a majority of Israeli support the pullout plan.

"Most people understand that this decision ensures Israel's future," Sharon said. "Today's decision gives hope to everyone."

Israel, Egypt to co-operate on Gaza after pullout

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and Egypt are "very close" to an agreement that will allow Egypt to move more troops into the border region to stop smugglers from moving weapons into the Gaza Strip, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said Monday.

The agreement would not require amendments to the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty of 1979, which limits the type of forces Egypt can deploy on the border, Shalom told a news conference after talks with Egyptian presidential adviser Osama Al Baz.

"We are now very close to implementing this understanding between Israel and Egypt that will allow them to have more than 100 troops, more than 100 soldiers, who will be on the Egyptian part of the border," Shalom said.

But Al Baz told reporters, "It's not a matter of us doing anything particular for the sake of Israel.

"We have a... vision for the role that Egypt can play to improve the situation... in the Palestinian territories," he said.

Shalom was in Egypt to see President Hosni Mubarak the day after the Israeli cabinet had approved a plan for Israel's disengagement from the Gaza Strip.

Egypt's co-operation could be crucial for Israel if Israeli forces withdraw from the border between Egypt and the Gaza Strip.

Also on the agenda to be discussed Monday were the security reforms the Egyptians are demanding from the Palestinian Authority before the arrival in the Gaza Strip next week of 80 security experts from Egypt who will train Palestinian Authority security forces.

After their meeting, Shalom and Al Baz announced that the two countries had established a committee to deal with bilateral matters in the political, military and economic spheres. The committee will not deal with Palestinian issues.

"The committee was established after a long period of differences of opinion between the sides," Shalom said. "I hope that we will now resolve a large portion of the misunderstandings of the past."

Asked about the return of Egypt's ambassador to Tel Aviv, Al Baz said, "We will not hesitate to make any move that would contribute to the peace, including reinstating the ambassador."

Israeli and Canadian camp counsellors connect

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — After a barbecue on the beach at Israel's fledgling, international overnight summer camp, Camp Kimama, 10 head staff members met with 28 representatives from five camps across Canada to exchange Jewish Zionist programming ideas.

The purpose of the meeting, which was sponsored by the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre in Montreal, the Montreal and Toronto Jewish federations, the Montreal Jewish Camp Council, Canada Israel Experience (CIE) and Young Judaea (YJ) Canada as part of a two-week "Machana'im" leadership development program, was to enable Canadian staff from the Y Country Camp, Camp B'nai Brith and YJ camps, Camp Kadima, Camp Shalom and Camp Kinneret Biluim, to elaborate on their existing Zionist programming and for the staff of Camp Kimama to learn how to build a camp based on the strong North American summer-camp tradition.

"Jewish camping is a major part of today's forming of Jewish identity, so we wanted to create some sort of meeting between Israeli Jewish camping and Canadian Jewish camping," says Lorne Klemensberg, director of the CIE in Israel.

"Camp Kimama is trying to bring the camping experience to Israel for the first time ever, so we thought it would be a great sharing experience for their staff to learn from the camping leaders of the Diaspora and for those camps to in turn learn how to bring Israel to the North American camping experience. It's a natural connection."

According to Jeff Rose, associate director of the Y Country Camp in Huberdeau, Que., the meeting was an invaluable experience for his staff, which accounted for half of the Canadian mission.

"We want to create programming that goes beyond Israel Day," says Rose, who explained that although the camp celebrates Shabbat and is Zionist in orientation, programming about Israel is lacking. "We want Israel to be represented in a more continuous way, like through nightly evening programs."

He says that this summer, the Y Country Camp will expand its Jewish programming and its Jewish programming committee to include the 14 participants at the meeting.

For 19-year-old Stephanie Gladman, head of dance at the Y Country Camp, even Israel Day requires adaptation. "I think we have to modify Israel Day to make it more interesting," says Gladman, who has decided to focus her program on Israeli folk dancing. "I am sure that after this trip we will be able to come together and figure out a better way to do it."

"Kids don't have to wait until Israel Day to hear about Israel," insists 27-year-old Anat Assa, who will serve as unit head for Kimama's senior girls section this summer.

Assa, who worked as a counsellor (shlichah) at BB Camp in Portland, Ore., and at Habonim in England, suggests bringing Israel into every day at camp.

"Make Israel Day every day," she says. "Take advantage of every extra 10 minutes you have to teach a Hebrew song, or a Hebrew word, or a game that you learned in Israel. Tell the campers about your experiences, show them pictures and explain to them why it is so important to be connected to Israel. Teach them something that you think will be useful for their Zionism and to give them an alternative to what they see on TV."

Noah Zatzman, a staff member in the senior Machar (tomorrow) unit at Camp Kadima in Nova Scotia, believes Assa's suggestion is easier said than done. "Our Jewish programming committee consists of people whose opinions represent a wide range of the political spectrum."

He says that when it comes to programming about Israel, it is a real challenge to remain objective. "But we are not only the campers' role models, we are their Jewish role models and their primary source of Zionist values. So it is very important that there is continuity in programming and that as staff members, we see eye to eye."

Shira Goldberg, Judaic programming director at Camp Kadima, insisted that it is possible to keep personal politics out of the picture. "My objective is to provide the campers and staff with the knowledge and tools that they need in order to analyze the information, but not to transmit my own political views," says Goldberg, who suggested a method of "backdoor learning" in which campers are engaged in fun programs that transmit Jewish knowledge and values without the campers realizing the program's objective.

"On this trip, we have had the opportunity to examine various issues from many sides and the trip has allowed us to formulate and consolidate our own knowledge of and views on issues so that we will be more effective in educating the campers on these issues."

Noam Weiser, head of Camp Kimama's Leaders in Training (LIT) program, suggests bringing Israel to camp in a way that will be relevant to the campers. "Bring back Israeli T-shirts that read 'McDonald's' and 'Coca-Cola' in Hebrew," he says. "All of this stuff paints a more realistic picture of what Israel is about and how it relates to them."

On the other hand, Weiser's primary concern for Camp Kimama was the problem of how to pave the way for the establishment of a unique Kimama tradition.

"My challenge is the fact that they are going to be all new campers," says Weiser. "When you guys grew up in camps, it was everyone's dream to be an LIT. But these campers won't know the dream of being an LIT and I need to create it."

"How do you create a tradition at a first-time international Jewish camp?" queries Assa. "How do you create that 'something' that you can only get at your camp?"

"It's a real challenge with a camp that is starting from scratch," Rose says. "The trick is to create essential parts – songs or symbols or certain routines – that will make the camp a unique experience from any other camp."

That's what has kept Gladman coming to the Y Country Camp for the last seven years. "I grew up at camp," says Gladman. "Part of growing up meant becoming a Zioinist.

"I have always been a Zionist, but I never really knew where that connected within myself," she says. "This is supposed to be a leadership program with the aim of bringing Jewish Zionist programs to camp. But it's much more than that. This trip has made me understand what being a Zionist really means."

Ex-chief rabbi speaks out on marriage

"Today, everyone marries as he sees fit in any case," he later explained to Ha'aretz. "This law was very important in its day, but today it is completely neutralized, and merely creates hatred."

The other rabbis at the conference greeted Rabbi Bakshi-Doron's statement with silence, but later, many described it as a "bombshell."

In his speech, Rabbi Bakshi-Doron gave several reasons why he thought the rabbinate's monopoly on marriages must end. First, he said, the law has become irrelevant, as growing numbers of Israelis are choosing to marry in civil ceremonies either abroad or in Israel (the state recognizes civil marriages conducted overseas, but not those conducted locally). Second, he said, the law encourages hatred of the rabbinate, since it is seen as the primary expression of religious coercion in Israel.

There is no law requiring male babies to be circumcised, he noted, yet most Israeli parents do so anyway.

Moreover, Rabbi Bakshi-Doron said, hundreds of thousands of non-Jews have immigrated here over the last decade. Very few will choose to convert, and it is impossible to legally prevent the rest from marrying unless they go abroad.

Rabbi Bakshi-Doron also argued that the insistence on religious marriages actually creates problems from the perspective of Jewish law, since it increases the incidence of adultery and bastardy (in Jewish law, a bastard is the product of an adulterous union). "We have to recognize that in Israeli society today, an atmosphere of sexual permissiveness prevails," he told Ha'aretz. "We should not coercively sanctify the unions of couples who do not want them sanctified and who do not understand the meaning of religious marriage."

Rabbi Bakshi-Doron said that during his tenure as chief rabbi he twice made similar remarks, but met with a chilly reception. Once, he said, a group of religious MKs even struck his words from the protocol.

"I know this is a taboo, because the law is perceived as one of the symbols of the state," he said. "But unfortunately, it's a symbol without content."

Tsohar, an organization of young religious Zionist rabbis that hosted the conference, stressed that Rabbi Bakshi-Doron's views did not represent those of the organization.

10,000 Iranians have volunteered for suicide missions: recruiters

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Thousands of Iranians have signed up for suicide attacks on Israel, as well as U.S.-led forces in Iraq and British author Salman Rushdie, a recruiting group said Sunday.

Shi'ite Iran has strongly condemned the occupation of Iraq and voiced its outrage at damage to shrines in the holy cities of Najaf and Karbala.

"Some 10,000 people have registered their names to carry out martyrdom operations on our defined targets," said Mohammad Ali Samadi, a spokesperson for the Committee for the Commemoration of Martyrs of the Global Islamic Campaign.

But he said the group would need the green light from Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei to launch the attacks.

The independent group said it started to register Iranian men and women prepared to carry out the attacks after Friday prayers last week and sent forms to religious universities.

"Our targets are mainly the occupying American and British forces in the holy Iraqi cities, all the Zionists in Palestine and Salman Rushdie," he said.

The father of Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, condemned Rushdie to death in 1989 for alleged blasphemy in his novel The Satanic Verses.

"It is not our fault that the Zionists have brought their wives and children to the occupied territories and have turned them into shields for themselves," he added, when asked about the killing of civilians. "Salman Rushdie is the only non-military target for us, because we believe his attack against Islam was much worse that a military assault," the spokesperson said.

Hardline cleric Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati urged worshippers at Friday prayers in Tehran to attack U.S. and British interests.

"It is the duty of every Muslim to threaten U.S. and British interests anywhere," he said.

Although Iran's reformist President Mohammad Khatami said in 2001 the death sentence against Rushdie should be seen as lifted, hardliners still occasionally call for his murder.

Fewer smokers

Some 24 per cent of the adult population in Israel smokes, the lowest percentage of smokers since records began being kept 32 years ago, according to a Health Ministry report for 2003-2004 published last week. However, more than 1,500 Israelis die from second-hand smoke every year, the report said.

PA police protest corruption

More than 100 members of the Palestinian security forces went on an unprecedented strike in Gaza last week, calling on the Palestinian Authority to end what they charged is rampant corruption among senior officers. Pressing PA President Yasser Arafat to take action, the protesters took over position belonging to the elite Force 17 in central Gaza and sent Arafat a letter with their demands. In it they said senior officers of the National Security Forces were "pursuing their personal interests at the expense of the homeland" and had turned the security forces into "fiefdoms."

Economy a stronger bet

Israel's economy is seen as a better investment than a year ago. In its annual analysis of investment risk in emerging markets, the Economist magazine this week ranked Israel eighth out of 29 countries, Ha'aretz reported. Rated on a 100-point scale, with zero being safest and 100 riskiest, Israel scored 37, down from 45 one year ago. Israel ranked as a better investment risk than Brazil, China, Hungary, India, Mexico and Turkey, and more of a risk than such highly rated countries as Hong Kong, Chile, Taiwan, Thailand, Poland and Singapore, which topped the list.

Panel to improve Arabs' lot

An Israeli committee recommended setting up a special authority to deal with the country's Arab citizens. According to the plan reported by Ma'ariv, the National Authority for Arab Affairs would work toward coexistence through initiatives such as encouraging members of Israel's largest minority to volunteer for national service. The recommendation was made by an interministerial committee set up to investigate the October 2000 pro-Palestinian riots in the Arab sector. Israeli Arab lawmakers criticized the committee for not backing the community's demands for a fairer allocation of public funds.

France, Israel co-operate

Israel's Magen David Adom emergency relief service signed a co-operation agreement with the French Red Cross. The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem said the deal, signed in Paris, is aimed at enhancing medical and emergency services on both sides, as well as improving Franco-Israeli relations. Magen David Adom signed a similar pact with the American Red Cross Society in 2002.

Palestinian leader Barghouti gets 165 years in jail

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — It may have been Marwan Barghouti's final moment in the public eye, so the Palestinian leader and convicted murderer made the most of it.

"Our people will prevail," he told Tel Aviv District Court on Sunday, shrugging off the 165-year prison sentence just handed him. "I don't care if I get life behind bars. My day of liberty will come when the occupation ends."

Barghouti's words were the latest salvo in the defiant political riff that has become his routine in his almost two-year-long trial.

Despite the sentence, many Israelis believe that Barghouti, a leader of the Palestinian uprising against Israeli civilians, might one day be freed for political reasons.

In May, Barghouti, a Palestinian legislator and West Bank leader of Fatah, the political faction of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, was found guilty of orchestrating gun ambushes by the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade that killed five people. The brigade is the terrorist arm of the Fatah movement.

Though Barghouti refused to recognize Israel's jurisdiction in the cases after being captured by Israeli troops in April 2002, he did mount a political defence.

In impromptu speeches in Arabic, English and fluent Hebrew, which he learned while serving a previous sentence in an Israeli jail, the 45-year-old Palestinian denied involvement in terrorist violence while defending violence as legitimate means of battle in the Palestinian intifadah against Israel.

His argument did little to sway the Tel Aviv District Court's three-judge panel, which found him guilty of involvement in five terrorist attacks. The panel also cleared him in connection with 21 other killings.

For many, the question of whether Barghouti deserved the sentence of five consecutive 25-year jail terms for murder – plus another 40 years for ordering a failed Jerusalem car bombing and belonging to a terror group – quickly became secondary to the question of what Israel gained or lost by his incarceration.

On the one hand, most Israelis view the trial as fair, particularly since Barghouti was cleared of 21 killings.

But many are wondering why Israel has prosecuted Barghouti while leaving Arafat untouched in his West Bank compound.

After Barghouti's conviction last month, Israeli Justice Minister Yosef "Tommy" Lapid said Israel could one day put Arafat on trial in a similar manner.

But some analysts see a different succession in the works – not of Arafat taking the stand after Barghouti, but of Barghouti taking up the mantle of Palestinian leadership after Arafat's gone.

"Sitting in jail has made Barghouti indisputably popular and famous, and Palestinian polls have long shown him as second only to Arafat in terms of public support," Ha'aretz's Danny Rubinstein noted.

According to his family and supporters, Barghouti has no intention of appealing the verdict or asking for a reduction of the sentence.

But many Israeli left-wingers suggest that officials will end up reducing Barghouti's jail time just to make sure that Islamic fundamentalists do not fill the political vacuum after Arafat has left the scene.

After the signing of the Oslo accords in 1993, Barghouti became a proponent of the two-state solution envisaged by the Oslo peace process. Israel would regard the Fatah leader as a far more attractive alternative to Hamas or Islamic Jihad.

There are precedents for Jerusalem freeing Barghouti for political purposes. Thousands of Palestinian terrorists, many convicted of murder, have been freed in Middle East deals that Israel felt were strategically necessary.

The most famous of these was that of the late Hamas founder, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, who was jailed for murder in 1989 but had his life sentence commuted eight years later when Israel released him as a goodwill gesture after a botched assassination of a Hamas figure by Mossad agents in Jordan.

But Yassin, unlike Barghouti, was tried in a closed security court that kept public scrutiny at bay. The very publicity surrounding Barghouti's trial, which took place in a civilian court, could hamper any future attempts at clemency.

"I hope that he will stay in jail and won't be let out of the back door in a political agreement," Nadine Passentin, an activist with the Victims of Arab Terror group, said outside the courtroom.

Feminist tells how to 'shore up' the Jewish family

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Blu Greenberg, whose name is virtually synonymous with modern Orthodox Jewish feminism, says it amazes her that for at least a decade she was aware of feminism but it had nothing to do with her life as an Orthodox Jew.

The New York-based author and founding president of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance reflected on her personal evolution in a recent interview at her Toronto hotel, when she was in town to speak at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The previous night, she had discussed Jewish family issues including divorce, intermarriage and same-sex marriage.

Although she would not want to return to the "protected, insulated model" – under which women married "Mr. Wrong" because they were considered over the hill at 21, and stayed in bad marriages because divorce was a "shandeh" – Greenberg is a firm believer in "the traditional model of a Jewish family ... as the primary vehicle for transmitting values.

"I'm small-C conservative by nature," Greenberg told The CJN, belying her liberal and sometimes decidedly unorthodox ideas. She believes, for example, that women should and will be ordained as rabbis in the Orthodox movement.

"It takes me a while to get to a new place in my thinking, but I don't close the door," Greenberg said. "I'm willing to deal with [issues]."

She credits her husband of 46 years – Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg, a prominent modern Orthodox rabbi and president of Jewish Life Network/Steinhardt Foundation – for much of her open-mindedness.

Blu Greenberg

As an Orthodox feminist, Greenberg feels she has "a task, a mission, a job to do in terms of communicating ideas. I feel Orthodoxy has to be prodded, or encouraged, to incorporate expression and find measures of women's equality."

Is she angry about the status quo? "No," she says. "I love being an Orthodox Jew. It's always been a great blessing in my life."

In her lecture on the Jewish family, Greenberg – who has master's degrees in clinical psychology and Jewish history – included practical suggestions for shoring up the Jewish family, including marriage preparation courses, matchmaking of friends and family, and "rabbinic recall" of newlyweds six months to a year after the wedding, to address problems before they escalate.

When Greenberg was growing up in the 1940s and '50s, and in the early years of her marriage, she didn't know anyone who was divorced, intermarried, or gay.

Now, of course, all that has changed. One statistic of note: Greenberg said the Jewish divorce rate is estimated at 40 per cent, which is lower than the 50 per cent rate in the general population. She believes that reflects a continuing influence of traditional Jewish family values.

Among the "powerful forces" affecting the Jewish family, Greenberg cited a wide acceptance of Jews in the greater society, higher education of Jews, assimilation, hedonism, individualism, gender equality, new sexual values, an acceptance of alternative lifestyles, a declining birth rate and a tendency (more in the United States than in Canada) for adult children to relocate to new communities. "All this has taken its toll on the Jewish family."

Jewish observance, she believes, is the most powerful resource for strengthening the Jewish family. A self-described workaholic, she noted that observing Shabbat "reprioritizes: I know that work is not my life. My family is my life, and my community is my life."

Interfaith dating, which is "frowned upon" by Orthodoxy, is "highly problematic," said Greenberg. Intermarriage is halachically forbidden and "a great erosion on a small population," given that only 16 per cent of children whose parents are intermarried are likely to consider themselves Jewish as adults, she explained.

She noted that the percentage of marriages in which one partner converts to Judaism is far lower than that of intermarriages, but added that "this is so complex, because I do believe converts bring strength, energy, vitality and a love of Judaism."

Greenberg is also struggling with halachic and theological issues concerning homosexuality. Although she counts among her family and friends gay individuals, including Rabbi Steve Greenberg (no relation) – an author and ordained Orthodox rabbi – she admits to confusion and "great areas of discomfort."

She believes there should be secular laws that protect same-sex unions, but that such unions should not be sanctified religiously, "a difficult thing to say to gay friends" who may have adopted values such as sexual fidelity and creating a Jewish home. She does tell them that she is listening to them.

"I think everybody has to deal with it. You can't push away the front page of the newspaper," she said.

Greenberg said that despite the challenges, she is optimistic about the Jewish family's future. "Here we are 4,000 years later. We have survived, and we are vital."

Weizmann panel examines keys to fighting cancer

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Understanding cancer, early detection and psychological support for patients undergoing genetic testing are the keys to successful diagnosis and therapy, a panel of medical experts said.

At the May 31 program presented by Weizmann Canada at Oakdale Golf and Country Club, Benjamin Geiger, dean of the faculty of biology at the Weizmann Institute of Science, said that as a result of molecular genetic advances, scientists now understand the biology of cells, tissues and full organisms, knowledge that allows them to consider new ways of cancer intervention and therapy.

While understanding cancer is not a guarantee to finding a cure, Geiger said, it is "an absolute necessity for moving in the right pathway."

Ten to 15 years ago, researchers were struggling to understand the complexity of cancer cells and the difference between them and normal cells.

"We were trying to fight against an enemy that was very poorly defined and very poorly understood," Geiger said.

Eleftherios Diamandis, head of clinical biochemistry at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto, spoke about the importance of early cancer detection, which leads to longer survival and better quality of life for patients.

Mary Jane Esplen, head of the program of psychosocial and psychotherapy research in cancer genetics at the University Health Network, spoke about the behavioural, psychological, physical and psychosocial impact of genetic testing on patients.

People who test positive for a genetic mutation often experience emotional distress, anxiety and depression. "You're dealing with life-altering information," Esplen said.

Support groups and genetic counselling are some of the services available to these patients.

Documentary explores Sbarro Pizzeria terror attack

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

We've all, unfortunately, become accustomed to hearing about suicide bombings in Israel and elsewhere.

Typically, we watch the events reported via satellite, framed by our television screen. And while we are outraged by what we see, and in some cases concerned for relatives and friends, in a few days we move on until the next terror attack.

But for the people directly involved in these attacks, it's hard to move on. Their lives are forever changed by these horrible, pointless killings.

Impact of Terror, airing on CBC-TV June 16 at 8 p.m., provides a unique viewpoint on one specific attack, the Sbarro Pizzeria in Jerusalem three years ago. Fifteen people died there and more than a hundred were injured.

Rather than the usual detached documentary, award-winning director Tim Wolochatiuk allows the people involved to provide the narrative: survivors of the attack, parents of the young victims, health-care attendants and doctors. This personalizes the experience in a very moving, yet appropriate, way.

In one especially poignant scene, a young girl who was three years old at the time of the attack tells her story.

"I remember that I flew through the window," she says of that fateful day. "And also, that my brother was burned."

Passersby are shocked by the carnage unfolding around them.

Today, the emotional scars are obvious. She is scared to play outside, "because there are terror acts," she says. "I'm scared because there's bombings all the time."

A teenage boy who survived shows mental scars. Since the attack, he's become obsessive compulsive about keeping neat and clean and has been unable to have a social life.

One of the rescuers at the scene of the blast comments on the eeriness of hearing cellphones ringing beside mangled bodies, knowing that friends and relatives are trying to contact their loved ones.

One emergency-room nurse worked on saving a young girl's life, unaware that her daughter was dying in another operating room.

Watching this film, you realize that these killings are not just about statistics – about the "15 dead" – but about the people who lived these lives and their friends and families and survivors who have to cope with the aftermath for the rest of their lives.

Impact of Terror premiered at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival and got rave reviews.

The Nalaga'at Troupe

MEMORABLE FIDDLER ON THE ROOF COMES OUT OF SMALL ONTARIO TOWN

You may not have heard of the Thistle Theatre of Embro, Ont., but its fall 2003 production of Fiddler On The Roof was chosen to represent the Western Ontario Drama League as one of five finalists in the Theatre Ontario Festival 2004 Awards last month in Sault Ste. Marie.

According to Barbara Anderson-Huget, executive director of Theatre Ontario, an astonishingly high proportion of Embro residents (90) were involved in the production. The town is located north of Ingersoll and has a population of about 600.

"They did a beautiful job," she said. "What struck me in particular was their use of a full chorus, even for numbers where a full chorus isn't usually required. It added so much because their voices were so beautiful."

Although it did not win for outstanding production, the show received an impressive array of awards and nominations at the awards ceremony that capped the five-day festival.

Director Keith Garner received a Richard Howard Award and Norm Northmore (the Constable) won for outstanding newcomer to the stage (Martin Klomp, as Perchik, was nominated in the same category). The play's wedding scene won the outstanding visual moment award and the entire company was cited for "imaginative adaptation of their production to the performance space." The pre-show Anataevka villagers won special adjudicator awards for replicating village scenes in the lobby.

Additionally, Andy Brockway (Tevye) was nominated for outstanding performance by a male in a leading role, Sandra Smith (Hodel) and Elaine Northmore (Yente) were nominated for outstanding performance by a female in a supporting role, and Jennifer Prole (Chava) and Mark Hazeleger (Fyedka) were nominated for outstanding juveniles. The play was also nominated for outstanding visual presentation.

Fiddler On The Roof, by Sheldon Harnick and Joseph Stein, has never lost popularity since it debuted more than 30 years ago.

The four other dynamic productions in the festival were Doc by Sharon Pollock (Sault Youth Theatre, Sault Ste. Marie); Over The River and Through The Woods by Joe DiPietro (Kanata Theatre); Drinking Alone by Norm Foster (Cambrian Players, Thunder Bay); and Staff Room by Joan Burrows, which won the outstanding production award (Curtain Club, Richmond Hill).

Nalaga'at Troupe from Israel: Twelve Israeli actors, most of whom are deaf and blind or partially so, have formed a theatrical group, Nalaga'at ("Do Touch") and developed a production through a long process involving work on motion skills and improvisation. The result is an acclaimed theatrical experience that Israeli audiences have loved, in which the actors seem to transcend their own limitations and a miracle seems to take place.

This unique combination of triumph over adversity fused with art has been described as a visual and emotional delight. It brings to the stage a strength and intensity that makes you forget that the actors can't see or hear. The actors suffer from Usher syndrome, a partial or total deafness at birth and a gradual shrinking of field of vision ending in total blindness.

Toronto is the first city of a North American tour marking the first time the production has been seen outside of Israel. Bathurst Street Theatre, 736 Bathurst St. $30 cash only. Thursday, June 17, 7:30 p.m. 416-640-8521. www.nalagaat.org.il

AGO Update: Art Gallery of Ontario director Mathew Teitelbaum is a much happier man now that big-name architect Frank Gehry reconfigured his $195-million makeover of the institution in a way that satisfies longtime AGO benefactor Joey Tanenbaum. A disgruntled Tanenbaum resigned from the gallery board in March, complaining that Gehry's earlier design would have needlessly destroyed many gallery spaces, including the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Sculpture Atrium. Now that those gallery spaces are spared, Tanenbaum is back on the board, and the AGO has redeemed itself from a public relations nightmare.

A night of Hebrew soul

By JOANNE LEBOVITS-BRODKIN
Special to the CJN

From the moment Joshua Nelson walked onto the stage at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, adorned in an embroidered kaftan and gold kippah, everyone in the audience of nearly a thousand was entranced.

Nelson, a black Jewish singer, takes elements of gospel, blues and spirituals and puts them into Judaism and Jewish music.

"I've been to New Orleans and I've seen it happen – people have a great time jumping and shouting. It's okay to be sombre on, say, Yom Kippur, but synagogue should be joyful, too, and have people clapping," Nelson said before his recent apperance at the shul.

"Gospel really has those elements. The music is very powerful, and I think that's why in the Christian realm, the Baptist movement is so big and people go to church. They want to hear good music."

Nelson opened the evening with a stirring rendition of Let There Be Peace on Earth. During this song, as well as while he was singing Eli Eli and the Chatzi Kaddish, Nelson was deeply absorbed in the messages the lyrics evoked, his hands across his chest and his eyes closed.

The tempo soon became upbeat and Nelson announced that at his Black Hebrew congregation "we clap, we dance, we just get down in temple." He then broke into a gospel-sounding Adon Olam and soon everyone in the audience was clapping.

"At the Black Hebrew synagogues, they get very ecstatic, to the point that they are shoutin, similar to what one sees in the Baptist church," Nelson said. "When the Torah is going to be read or when it is opened, the congregants get very excited – they're a very spiritual community.

"Once, at the Commandment Keepers Ethiopian Hebrew Congregation in New York, I saw a woman get up and touch the Torah as it was being carried around, and she did this…" Nelson then fell to the ground, pretending to faint.

Nelson was once criticized for going to the "goyim" to get his inspiration. To Nelson, this is nonsense. "What we call 'soul' has nothing to do with Jesus, Christianity or the church. It is something that was brought over from the slave ships and Africa.

"Anything that is associated with Africa has those rhythms and what the blacks did was to take that element and put it into their newly found music."

Nelson says playing in Orthodox synagogues can present a challenge for him because getting up and clapping may be considered disrespectful. However, he believes that "HaShem would not deem it so and would want us to enjoy the service."

As a youngster, Nelson found an album by the gospel-music singer Mahalia Jackson at his grandparents' house. When he played the record, he fell in love with the music and began to sing along. Nelson's voice bears a striking resemblance to Jackson's.

Jackson is considered to have transformed the way people sing in church, and Nelson is having an equally powerful effect on the way many Jews are praying in shul.

Nelson's dreams of peace and harmony extend beyond the Jewish community. He loves diversity and believes it reduces prejudice and racism.

Nelson's choir is a perfect example of diversity. Consisting of about 30 members both young and old, the choir includes singers of different cultures and religions, including members who are Jewish, African-American and Puerto Rican.

When Nelson launched into Joshua Fit the Battle of Jericho, the crowd went wild. You could have sworn the walls were shaking.

He brought down the house when he had the audience singing Hineh Matov to the tune of When the Saints Go Marching In.

Building on the excitement in the packed sanctuary, Nelson shouted, "None of my services are complete unless you do the horah." And then he began an electrifying version of Havenu Shalom Alechem. Some audience members jumped out of their seats and formed a long horah train.

Joshua Nelson

Many of Nelson's fans were introduced to him through a 2001 documentary film about him, the award-winning Keep on Walking, which has been shown at many Jewish film festivals.

Nelson has performed with Aretha Franklin and Wynton Marsalis, along with the late greats Cab Calloway and Dizzy Gillespie. His audiences have included former U.S. president Bill Clinton, as well as the prime ministers of Israel and Sweden.

Baycrest group's repertoire spans Broadway to Beatles

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Next time you visit the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, listen for the eclectic sounds of the Baycrest Music Society.

The group – which includes singers and musicians drawn from among staff, family members and others affiliated with Baycrest – has a repertoire that ranges from Broadway to classical, and from Jewish folk songs to the Beatles.

Amy Clements-Cortes, the centre's music therapist and the group's spokesperson, says speech/language pathologist Regina Jokel formed the group several years ago to give staff an opportunity to develop their musical skills, get to know their co-workers and re-energize after a busy day.

Taking part helps relieve stress, Clements-Cortes says, adding that she "greatly believes in the healing power of music and strongly feels that staff are benefiting from being in the group."

In addition, she says, "we wanted Baycrest's name known for something unique – music – and we wanted to provide entertainment for staff, clients and each other."

Each season, the society presents concerts at Baycrest for clients and staff, and also performs for outside institutions and synagogues, such as Central Park Lodge and Temple Sinai.

> 'We wanted Baycrest's name known for something unique – music – and we wanted to provide entertainment for staff, clients and each other'

"Our clients at Baycrest and those we perform for outside of Baycrest really enjoy our performances, and their responses are so rewarding for the choir members and musicians."

The group's director Matthew Jaskiewicz brings an impressive portfolio and a wealth of experience to the conductor's podium, spanning continents, cultures and musical genres.

A graduate of the Warsaw Academy of Music, Jaskiewicz launched his career directing prestigious ensembles in Poland and France. His choirs have helped earn him international distinction and many awards.

After moving to Canada in 1984, he founded several musical groups, including the Toronto Sinfonietta Orchestra and the Musica Antiqua Vocal Ensemble.

He enjoys working with both professional and amateur musicians.

"I have a lot of respect for good musicians. I never try to humiliate, or even embarrass, them," Jaskiewicz says.

"From professionals, I expect their best. From amateur musicians, I expect constant improvement of their skills. They all should show devotion and love of music."

For more information, or to book the group for a performance, call Clements-Cortes at 416-785-2500, ext. 2304.

Suicide attacks – a phenomenon as old as recorded history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Suicide bombers are the bane of our times.

In recent years, they have struck in Israel, the Palestinian territories, Lebanon, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and Morocco, not to mention the United States, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, Spain, Russia and Indonesia – killing and maiming thousands of civilians and soldiers.

Christoph Reuter

The vast majority of the perpetrators are Muslims – Arabs, Chechens, Pakistanis and Indonesians – but the bombers have been of Tamil and Japanese origin as well.

Lamentably enough, far too many Muslims, including supposedly respectable clerics, have endorsed the tactic.

Two years ago, at a conference of Muslim scholars in Beirut, a resolution was passed that suicide attacks against "the Zionist enemy" are permitted.

The opinion was seconded by none other than Saudi Arabia's minister for Islam, Sheik Salleh Abdul Aziz Mohammed.

Around the same time, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Britain, Ghazi Algosaibi, and Yasser Arafat's wife, Suha, condoned such practices.

In a poem in the London newspaper Al-Hayat glorifying the bombers, Algosaibi wrote, "May Allah witness that you are martyrs."

And in an interview in Al Majalla, another Arabic newspaper based in London, Suha Arafat observed: "Would you expect me and my children to be less patriotic and more eager to live than my countrymen and their father and leader who is seeking martyrdom?"

Suicide attacks leave a profound impression.

"They remind us that there are people who consider their struggle – whatever the cause – to be more important than their lives," writes Christoph Reuter in an important new book, My Life Is A Weapon: A Modern History of Suicide Bombing (Princeton University Press). "They stir up fear in us; they pull the rug from under our feet."

And he adds: "They annihilate the entire logic of power, since no credible threat can be made against someone who has no desire to survive."

A reporter on the staff of the German magazine Stern, Reuter has written a concise, illuminating account of a phenomenon as old as recorded history itself.

Japanese kamikaze pilots ushered in the modern era of suicidal attacks by crashing their planes into American aircraft carriers during World War II.

But long before that, the Sicarians in Imperial Rome and the so-called Assassins in the Middle East were wreaking their special brand of violence.

Lest we forget, the first suicide attack in the contemporary Mideast was perpetrated by three Japanese gunmen who killed 24 tourists, mainly Puerto Rican pilgrims, at Ben-Gurion Airport on May 30, 1972.

Iran may have been inspired by these precedents during its protracted war with Iraq in the 1980s.

In human wave assaults reminiscent of World War I, tens of thousands of very young men, sporting small keys to paradise dangling around their necks, charged recklessly toward Iraqi positions in the name of Allah.

Tens of thousands of Iranians were mowed down, dying needless deaths.

"The more people die for our cause, the stronger we become," claimed Iran's spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, in a typically bombastic remark. "The Tree of Islam can only grow if it's constantly fed with the blood of martyrs."

Taking its cue from Khomeini, Hezbollah was the first Islamic movement in the region to dub suicide attacks "martyr operations."

Aided by Iran, Hezbollah planned and carried out suicide bombings in Lebanon, killing scores of American, French and Italian peacekeeping soldiers in the early 1980s.

Israel has also tasted the bitter fruits of Islamic zealotry.

Welcomed to southern Lebanon by Shiites with rice and rose water after its 1982 invasion, the Israeli army soon found itself pitted against Hezbollah in a classic guerrilla war in which suicide attacks were a feature of the conflict.

Israel wisely cut its losses and withdrew unilaterally from its self-declared security zone in Lebanon in May 2000.

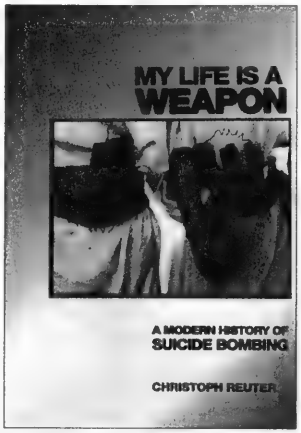
More recently, ever since Baruch Goldstein's 1994 rampage in Hebron, during which he murdered 29 Palestinian Arabs in a mosque, the Palestinians have perfected the deadly art of suicide bombing.

As Reuter points out, the aim of every suicide bomber is to reach paradise. By way of example, he reprints two letters from bombers to their bereaved families:

"My beloved parents, I know that it's hard… for you to lose me, but don't forget that we'll see each other in paradise."

"Dear Mama: be patient and happy and pray to God to thank him for giving you a martyr as a son."

Reuter claims that Islam implicitly sanctions suicide attacks, though some imams are clearly opposed to this method of inflicting pain on the enemy.



Martyrdom, a widely respected concept in Islam, is nurtured by a combination of Qur'anic teachings, fatwas (religious rulings) and promises of attaining a state of nirvana in paradise.

Strictly speaking, Islam forbids suicide and condemns Muslims who commit suicide, but in practice, politically inspired forms of suicide are quite acceptable.

Sheikh Mohammed Sayyed Tantawi, a leading scholar at Cairo's Al Azhar University, has said that suicide attacks are permissible if they target Israelis – men, women and children.

Israelis are beyond the pale because they comprise the "forces of occupation." Therefore, "martyrdom operations" are permitted.

Similarly, Sheikh Hamid al-Bitawi, a Hamas ideologue, has ruled that if "infidels" occupy even the tiniest bit of Muslim land, as happened when the Jews occupied what he considers Palestine, "the jihad becomes a duty for every individual."

It's clear that Islamic theology is flexible and open to interpretation when it comes to Israelis.

Contrary to some preconceptions, the typical Palestinian suicide bomber is not necessarily poor, fanatically religious and undereducated.

"Today's suicide commandos are a mirror image of their society," Reuter quotes Tel Aviv University psychologist Ariel Merari as saying.

Though they are primarily pious Muslims, suicide bombers cannot otherwise be neatly categorized. They run the gamut from simple workers to university graduates.

Take the case of Hanadi Jaradat, the bomber who blew up almost two dozen Israelis at Maxim's seaside restaurant in Haifa on Oct. 4, 2003. She was a lawyer.

According to Merari, " the vast majority of suicide bombers are quite normal people." What really sets them apart from others is that they are fearless and hold strong, unbending convictions.

After years of strife and despair, the Palestinians have developed what Reuter describes as "a culture of death" within their civil society.

During the early phases of the Oslo peace process, when hope seemed to be around the corner, suicide bombings were widely rejected by Palestinians.

But in today's climate of hopelessness and mutual mistrust, most Palestinians justify suicide attacks.

As long as the Arab-Israeli conflict remains unresolved, suicide attacks will haunt and torment Israelis for years to come.

My Life Is A Weapon explains this with admirable clarity.

ACJS holds conference

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG –Abe Arnold was presented with the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS) Distinguished Service Award at the ACJS's recent annual conference.

The Distinguished Service Award, which Arnold received during the ACJS conference that took place from May 30 to June 1, honours an individual, group or institution that has made significant contributions to Canadian Jewish Studies.

The founding director of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada from 1968 to 1975, Arnold has won three prestigious awards to support research in Canadian Jewish history.

The new Canadian Society for Jewish Studies, which was formed at the ACJS conference, has been set up, reports Ira Robinson, a professor of Jewish studies at Concordia University. He said that a nine-member executive has been established and bylaws have been adopted. "We are looking forward to the future."

The ACJS conference, held at the Asper Jewish Community Campus and the University of Manitoba, featured 24 papers – delivered by lay and academic scholars from across Canada – and two major panel discussions.

Jewish dissent in Canada was one of the key themes of the conference.

Ester Reiter of York University and Roz Usiskin, past president of the Jewish Heritage Society of Western Canada, made a joint presentation on the rocky historical relationship between the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the United Jewish Peoples Order (UJPO).

UJPO is a left-wing Jewish organization that once had a large following, particularly in Western Canada. "At its core, UJPO's mission was to preserve and strengthen Jewish identity," said Usiskin.

UJPO has always been openly secularist and radical. It was over the question of German rearmament in the early 1950s that UJPO ran afoul of the CJC. The American government supported German rearmament, so the Canadian government followed suit, said Reiter.

"The CJC initially opposed rearmament but changed its stand under pressure from the government. UJPO refused to change its position. As a result, Reiter says, CJC leaders Samuel Bronfman and Saul Hayes manipulated congress, so as to illegally expel UJPO as a member organization.

"UJPO's expulsion from congress split the Winnipeg Jewish community," Usiskin said.

It was only in 1995 that Congress, under the leadership of Irving Abella, welcomed UJPO back into the fold.

Sheryl Nestel of the University of Toronto read her paper, Mapping Jewish Dissent: Jewish anti-occupation activism in Toronto, for which she had interviewed Jewish Torontonians who oppose Israeli policies.

Nestel found that these Jewish Torontonians feel isolated from the wider Jewish community because of their views, but they are also uncomfortable with the anti-Semitism of non-Jewish leftist friends. She noted that they feel at home only with other Jews who share their leftist views.

Harold Buchwald, who chaired the session, voiced one criticism in his concluding remarks. No one on the panel represented the "establishment side," he said.

Herb Brown helps brother Larry coach Detroit Pistons in NBA finals

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Herb Brown knew he wanted to leave his post as an assistant coach with the Portland Trail Blazers after the 2002-03 NBA season. He talked to a couple of other clubs and considered returning to Europe to coach, but he landed where he felt he really wanted to be when his younger brother Larry offered him an assistant coaching position on the Detroit Pistons staff.

Motown is where it all began for Brown 28 years ago, when he got his first NBA coaching job with the Pistons, and he says not much has changed in the organization since then. The team has the same owner, William Davidson, and a lot of the same people are still around.

It is Brown's third time assisting his brother, a Basketball Hall of Fame coach, after previous stints in Philadelphia and Indiana.

"My brother's a great coach, and I just want to help him succeed," Herb, 67, said in a recent telephone interview before the Pistons beat the Indiana Pacers in six games to win the Eastern Conference finals and earn a shot at the NBA title.

"The only thing he hasn't done in his career is win an NBA championship and hopefully we will be able to accomplish that and add another accolade to his fine resumé."

Over the course of their lengthy coaching career, the brothers haven't always been together on the sidelines. They coached six games against each other in the 1970s, when Herb was with the Pistons and Larry the bench boss of the Denver Nuggets.

Herb admits the games were difficult, because they were both in situations where they had to win and each brother knew that beating the other would hurt.

After a 54-28 regular season, the Browns are back in the finals for the first time since they led Philadelphia there three seasons ago. The Pistons play Game 2 against the Los Angeles Lakers at Staples Center June 10 in L.A.

In 2001, the 76ers succumbed in five games to the Lakers, but Herb had no time to wallow. He got a call the next morning asking him to coach the U.S. men's basketball team at the following month's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Larry Shyatt, the University of Clemson coach, had withdrawn from the position three weeks before training camp, citing concerns about the team's security in light of the outbreak of the second intifadah.

Brown, who had guided the 1997 team to a bronze medal and was slated to be an assistant this time around, says Shyatt had also talked a lot of players out of going to Israel.

"My kids said 'Daddy, are you sure you want to do this,'" Brown recalled of his own family's worries. "I said yeah, 'I have to do it.' I'm an American Jew and I know how important Israel is to Jews in the United States and all over the world.

"The Maccabiah Games are a tremendous celebration and I didn't want to see it go down the drain."

Brown remembers having a great experience at the 1997 competition, but his work assembling the 2001 U.S. team, which went on to win gold, was truly memorable.

He credits the tremendous amount of support he had with making it possible, including some members from the 1997 team who helped him recruit and who decided themselves to come back and play again while persuading others to re-think their decision about not going to Israel.

"We had to get 11 players," said Brown, with Eric Gingold being the only one who had decided he would definitely play after Shyatt's departure left the team in the lurch.

"We uncovered some Jewish basketball players throughout the country and were able to get 12 guys. They bonded together and were terrific, wonderful human beings and pretty good players."

In March 2002, Brown was honoured by the National Council of Young Israel with the Chovevei Yisrael (Lover of Israel) Award for his support of the Jewish state. He also received the Hank Greenberg Sportsmanship Award that year and is a member of the board of the United States Sports for Israel Committee.

Brown is in line for an assistant coaching position on the Canadian team at next summer's Maccabiah Games behind head coach John Dore of Concordia University.

With 40-plus years of hoops experience, Brown is the author of two books on basketball, and a third – on defence – will be published in the fall.

The 1957 University of Vermont graduate spent 15 summers coaching in Puerto Rico and he guided the Israel Sabres to the European Professional Basketball League title in 1975.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH and BEVERLY KRAFT

Beverly: As we all know, bridge players love to argue about the game. A real deal is not necessarily required to get them going; theoretical points and hypothetical combinations will stir up the pot just as readily. The better the players, the more rational the discussion should be, but even among experts capable of submerging their egos, the search for the truth will not always be successful. Indeed, there may be more than one truth.

Some of the most heated discussions involve contracts that could have been defeated with a different line of defence, particularly when the winning approach is not clearly indicated by the available evidence. Take this deal, for example . . .

No one vulnerable, North deals. You'll be in the East seat.

West	North	East	South
	1♦	1♠	4♥
All Pass

Partner leads the ♠K and North tables a fair dummy.

North
♠ 1076
♦ AQJ109
♣ AK84

East
♠ AQJ832
♥ 643
♦ K6
♣ 32

What do you think are your possible defensive options?

Eric: There are two sensible ways for East to conduct the defence.

The more obvious approach: East overtakes the ♠K (a possible singleton) to continue with more rounds of spades, hoping to promote a trump winner or two for West, perhaps with the ♦K still to come. If declarer discards a diamond on the third spade, East intends to play a fourth spade.

The alternative plan: East tries to discourage a spade continuation and encourage a diamond switch. East aspires to take two spades and one diamond and hopes West can contribute a trump trick. Even if declarer spurns the diamond finesse and attempts to discard a diamond on the third round of clubs (as here), East, holding only two clubs, will foil this plan by trumping in to kill the useful discard. Declarer will take six hearts, the ♦A, and two clubs, for one down.

Here is the complete deal:

North
♠ 1076
♦ AQJ109
♣ AK84

West	East
♠ K5	♠ AQJ832
♥ K7	♥ 643
♣ J10965	♣ 32

South
♥ AQJ10982
♣ Q7

Only the second line of defence works on this rather specific layout, but failing to cash spades could be fatal on a variety of combinations (picture declarer with 2=7=3=1 distribution, for example; declarer wins the diamond switch and discards a spade on the ♣K before attacking trumps). Overtaking the ♠K will usually succeed when West holds only one spade, and will not cost whenever declarer cannot avoid the diamond finesse. If West has two spades, it is unlikely that the defence will be able to develop two trump tricks; East's three small trumps don't leave much room for a useful holding in West.

Which card should East play at trick one to attract a diamond switch?

Some would say that it should be enough for East simply to discourage a spade continuation (the deuce for standard players). Others believe that "three-way signals" are best when the player making the signal has shown a long (please define minimum length carefully) suit. They would play the queen or jack (high) to request a diamond switch, the deuce (low) to suggest a club switch, and the eight (a middle card) to encourage. If East had a club ruff coming, the suit-preference approach would handle it smoothly where the standard approach might leave some doubt.

It may well be that on the very next deal that you encounter the approach that you dismissed on this deal will work.

Beverly: That would not mean that either plan is in principle better or worse, no matter how vocal its supporters might be: rather, it simply means that in this wonderful game of ours it's important to be not only skilful but also a little lucky.

Eric: Bridge, like golf, is a particularly humbling game. Unlike golf, however, a mediocre bridge player or team can beat the experts if it's a bad day for superior technique and the stars are aligned propitiously for the underdogs' less enlightened approach. That's one of the reasons so many people love to play.

Three generations of tzedakah something

By MIRIAM PORTER

My telephone rang just as the smoke detector started beeping. My inquisitive, meowing cats added to the annoying high-pitched sounds. I frantically fanned my latest Chatelaine magazine in the air to get rid of the smoke and sadly removed my burnt dinner from the oven. "Crazy oven must be broken," I thought. (Always blame the oven.)

I answered the phone. It was my neighbour across the hall, Jonah Bekhor. Embarrassed, I told him my sob story. Minutes later, I graciously accepted an invitation for Shabbat dinner with Jonah and his family. The Bekhor family is known for being kind and helping others.

Jonah, 29, grew up in a home that practised tzedakah. "My parents and grandparents inspire me in terms of the importance they place on serving in the community," he explains.

Throughout his high school years at Upper Canada College, Jonah volunteered at the Bloorview MacMillan Children's Centre, where he played wheelchair hockey with the kids who lived there. His monthly visits encouraged others to participate in games, and he created many friendships.

Jonah was also involved in the Evergreen Foundation's yearly tree planting event for elementary school children.

"I was assigned kids with learning disabilities, and I would take them outside and teach them how to plant trees. The event was great and it took over the whole park."

Over March break one year, Jonah ran the dinosaur dig at the Royal Ontario Museum. "There was a giant sandbox, and the kids would dig in to find the bones and brush off the sand. My job was to get them to figure out what kind of bone it was."

Another year he organized the "Fun Run" at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. "I encouraged other kids in my high school to participate and sign up."

Volunteering at Baycrest and Mount Sinai Hospital is a tradition for the Bekhor family. Jonah's father, Edward, has served on many committees at Baycrest over the years. Jonah's mother, Tobie, is currently chair of Baycrest's volunteer advisory committee and an honorary board member. From 1993 to 1995, she served as president of the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary, and in 1987 and 1989, Tobie was president of the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary.

The tradition began with Tobie's own mother, Florence Cooper. During the late 1950s, Florence was a hands-on volunteer for 13 years in the outpatient department at Mount Sinai. She currently sits on the board of the women's auxiliaries at Baycrest and Mount Sinai.

Florence and Tobie are being feted in the fall for their ongoing dedication at a luncheon in their honour by the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary Living Legacy Endowment Fund.

Jonah's grandfather, Sydney Cooper, is on the building committee at Baycrest and Mount Sinai. He, too, has a long history of volunteer work and is currently involved in numerous projects in Toronto and Israel.

Jonah, the younger of two boys, recently volunteered as a programmer for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF). For six months prior to the festival, he screened films and examined them for significant Jewish content. The festival ran from May 1 to May 9 at the Bloor Cinema and the Miles Nadal JCC. Jonah introduced films and led question-and-answer sessions.

"I was really honoured when the TJFF invited me to become a programmer. They provided an opportunity for me to become more deeply involved in film, and I also become more involved in Jewish culture through the films I screened and the ideas they provoked."

Jonah is hardly a novice when it comes to the media industry. He works as a freelance writer for television commercials and music video treatments. "I am also developing an entrepreneurial venture focusing on marketing and new media," he says.

Despite hectic schedules of the various family members, the Bekhors make time for the things that are important.

We had a wonderful dinner together. I may "accidentally" turn my oven up too high next week, so that I'll be forced to return for another home-cooked meal.

PASTA SALAD W/BROCCOLI & CASHEWS

1 lb. medium pasta shells, cooked and drained
1/4 cup vegetable oil
6 cups broccoli florets with peeled and sliced stems
2 cups sliced mushrooms
1 1/2 cups chopped fresh parsley
1/2 cup chopped red onion
1/4 to 1/2 cup white vinegar
1 cup mayonnaise
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 cup toasted, unsalted cashews

Sauté broccoli in hot oil in a large skillet, about 10 mins. Add mushrooms, onions and parsley and sauté for 6 mins. more, stirring frequently. In large mixing bowl, combine vinegar, mayonnaise and mustard. Add vegetables and pasta; toss to combine. Just before serving top with cashews. Serve cold or at room temperature.

A true chaver, and handy with a drill

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

My first dentist was Dr. Heinrich, a man who failed to see the advantage of giving me an anesthetic prior to filling my cavities. At six years old, I wasn't privy to less painful options, for if I had been, I might have forwarded an achy testimony of discontent to the folks in Geneva.

In later years, it struck me that a replacement for Dr. Heinrich was in order.

One day, a pleasant gentleman walked into my office at the United Jewish Appeal. He spoke in a downtown drawl, one common to the generation of handball lovers, and introduced himself as Dr. Saul Kendal, the chairperson of the UJA's dentists' division.

Immediately, I sensed that this sweet and unhurried man would act responsibly with a drill in hand, and a short while later, I found myself in his office at Finch and Bathurst.

Saul greeted me with his twinkling eyes and a wonderfully warm salutation sprinkled with the dental dialect that makes you nervous, yet sort of puts you at ease. I sat in his chair and he set about probing my mouth.

"It looks like you have a cavity," he said. "I think we should fill it today so you don't have to come back."

I began to recite a prayer my mother had taught me – "Fortunate are those who walk with the righteous" – as I prepared for the sound of the drill, a sound that is no doubt riling you as you read this.

Instead, I felt a sharp tool poking at my gums. My face became rubbery, and as I tried to yell for help, my consonants unravelled and I became as inarticulate as a simple man learning with a Talmud scholar.

Saul had frozen my mouth. I was drooling, but, he assured me, I was safe.

That day, Saul filled my cavity with finesse and tenderness while making me feel welcome and protected at the same time. It seemed that I had found my dentist, and I discovered a new friend.

Saul Kendal is an exceptional Jewish soul with a powerful understanding of "friendship" and the ability to make others feel singularly significant. He likely honed this gift as a kid hanging out in his father's barbershop, but I think it mostly comes naturally to him.

Sometimes, I watch Saul in his office or at a crowded community event as he engages others in conversation. He listens carefully. His eyes connect with theirs and, in a most unassuming manner, he expresses a sincere curiosity about their lives.

Six years ago, Saul belatedly celebrated his bar mitzvah at age 63. It was his glorious moment, yet he made me feel as though I was the guest of honour. My guess is that everyone else in the room felt the same way.

If Saul were an unhappy and distant man, we would understand. We would because he, his elegant wife Yetta and their family lost one of their sons, Darren, in a car accident in 1982. Despite this tragedy – one Judaism says cleanses you of all your sins – or perhaps because of it, Saul chose to exude more love, warmth and friendship.

Once a month, for the last 45 years, Saul plays cards with 11 of his "Stand By Me" buddies, friends he's had since childhood. Each poker player at that table is in some way a custodian of the other's history and partners in an epoch of camaraderie that defines friendship.

This is the school that Saul is an alumnus of. He is a student of "closeness," a true chaver (friend) – and he is adept with a drill.

"A Friend may well be reckoned the masterpiece of Nature."

– Ralph Waldo Emerson

Unique gift ideas for special occasions

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

At times, finding just the right gift for an upcoming event can be very difficult. A gift should be as unique as the person who receives it. To help in the search for distinctive gifts, here are two fabulous places to consider.

The Artistic Wedding (416-784-9303) offers one of the most beautiful gift ideas for weddings. Elyssa Wortzman, who is an artist by profession, creates custom-made paintings that can be given to the bride and groom as a wedding present. Her paintings usually represent the wedding ceremony or the couple themselves.

Wortzman says the inspiration for her business came from the beauty of the ceremonies.

"It all began when I went to a wedding in a beautiful temple. Everything was so moving that I was inspired to create something more memorable than a photograph, which can become dated with time."

Although she can work from a photo, Wortzman likes to attend the ceremonies herself, so that she can truly capture the essence of the simchah.

"I feel like I'm connecting to my clients because it is such an important moment of their life," she says.

Wortzman's paintings are especially popular with couples who have been previously married. Since they usually already own all the necessary things that couples receive, a painting that depicts their marriage ceremony is a perfect gift.

As well as the paintings, which can be registered for or given as gifts, Wortzman also offers contemporary ketubot and other gift ideas, such as the Lover's Box. This box, which has a three-dimensional painting, depicts the couple on the couple's wedding day, their vows and the bride's bouquet.

Although Wortzman specializes in weddings, she is available for bar and bat mitzvahs and corporate events as well as for private commissions. A catalogue of her work is available at www.elyssa wortzman.com.

Another fantastic idea for gifts, a store that has exploded into Toronto's newest hotspot is OMNI² Jewels & Java (416-783-7604). In addition to offering "upscale jewelry at discounted prices," it is now part coffee shop and restaurant as well.

The world's first and only store of its kind, it is located at the northeast corner of Glencairn Avenue and Bathurst Street. It opened last November to a crowd of more than 5,000 people.

The store is owned by Jack Berkovitz and came into existence, he says, because most jewelry stores are just plain intimidating.

"People are often scared to go into jewelry stores," Berkovitz says. "This way, people can be introduced to the store by getting a cup of coffee."

This formula seems to be working, because as the demand for the restaurant grows, so does its menu. What started as a coffee shop has grown into a full-fledged restaurant that offers delicious nouvelle cuisine that is kosher under the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) and Cholov Yisroel.

"Our love and dedication to jewelry is now shared with our newfound love for cooking," Berkovitz says.

The casual and friendly environment makes it easier for prospective clients to explore the jewelry side of the store. While out for dinner, people can wander over and enjoy browsing around for stunning trinkets.

The store offers beautiful, unique jewelry that would make excellent gifts for any simchah. Tennis bracelets are very popular, as well as diamond chandelier earrings.

The versatile eatery is also available to hold parties. The store has already hosted events for the Bank of Montreal and the Zareinu Educational Centre, as well as several Sheva Brachot.

Although this location is the only one that is a combined store and restaurant, OMNI Jewels has another store, located at 7733 Keele St., at Highway 7.

Ritché's eveningwear designs known in Toronto for more than half a century

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

After more than a half a century on the Toronto fashion scene, eveningwear designer Jack Ritché has seen many trends come and go.

Ritché has also been successful in adapting his company to the changes in the Canadian fashion industry, which today is predominantly comprised of imported rather than domestic clothing.

The founder of Ritché (416-789-4378), the elegant bridal salon at 1662 Avenue Rd., started his career at the age of 15, as a tailor in a small Polish town near the Austrian border.

The only member of his family to survive the Holocaust, Ritché spent much of the war in Siberia before joining the Polish army in 1944 to fight the Nazis.

In 1945, he studied fashion design in Vienna, immigrating to Canada in 1948 with his wife, Helen, then eight months pregnant.

Ritché first worked as a custom tailor on Spadina Avenue. "I was happy to work making 60 cents an hour. After a few weeks, in conversation, I mentioned it was hard living with a small baby in one furnished room. The owner suggested that I should sell him my baby son."

Ritché found a new employer who paid him $1 an hour. Six months later, he was refused a raise and set up his own shop in the financial district on King Street, where he custom-made suits for men, and later women.

His first female client, Margaret Dixon, told Ritché he needed to relocate to a more fashionable area of town. Dixon, who was known as Dixie – she later married Norman Jewison – became a longtime client of Ritché.

"She inspired me. She said, 'Mr. Ritché your place should be on Bloor Street.' I made Dixie suits and dresses."

In 1952, he opened the first Ritché salon for women on Bloor next door to Holt Renfrew. He shared the two-storey boutique with a partner who specialized in menswear, but they later parted.

Ritché was known for his custom designs, made exclusively from fine designer fabric imported from Europe. In the '60s, he opened more salons: Ritché Couture and Bridal, Ritché's of Colonnade and Miss Ritché, moving the workshop off-site to the Ritché factory on Spadina Avenue.

He later began making wedding gowns that were sold across Canada. A major coup, he says, was selling his gowns to Kleinfeld's, the largest bridal store in New York. At the height of his manufacturing business he employed a staff of 25 dressmakers.

His wife ran the flagship store on Bloor and was active in the business until 1981, when their daughter Vivian Prussky joined the company, he says. "Helen was my right arm."

Today Vivian and her husband Arthur Prussky run the company. Ritché's son Alan is an executive in the computer industry.

As the business expanded in the '50s, Ritché became increasingly involved in fashion shows and beauty pageants where he would showcase his custom-made gowns.

"I had my own annual fashion and bridal shows and charity shows. I participated in the Miss Toronto pageant in 1959 and later in the Miss Canada pageant. I made all the gowns. All the bridal shows were attended by 800 to 1,200 people."

He says over the years he organized bridal shows at synagogues in conjunction with wedding consultants and planners who would invite their clients.

Ritché says he experienced a "major disaster" in 1969 when a fire broke out at the Bloor Street store. "We had to restart all the orders for the weddings," he recalls, adding that everything was finished on time.

He explains that in those days, many people ordered custom eveningwear and wedding gowns. "You didn't have the variety and selection in dresses that you have today, and everyone wanted to look different. My customers were personalities from TV, such as Joyce Davidson, Eva Gabor and others."

He says times have changed and custom-made wedding-gowns are no longer the mainstay of the business. The company's flagship store moved to its present location on Avenue Road just North of Lawrence Avenue in 1986. The 6000-square-foot bridal salon offers three floors of bridal wear, from mother- of-the bride and bridesmaid dresses and accessories such as tiaras, veils and shoes, to bridal gowns to suit every taste.

"We have five rooms of gowns for the brides. Our sales staff is very experienced. You have to serve and to please the customer. This has always been the success of our business," Ritché says.

Half a decade of Ritché formals

Today most of the dresses at the salon – from the exclusive designer lines to the less-known labels – are imported, says Ritché. "You can't compete anymore with the imports. An imported gown that sells for $1,200 or $1,300 couldn't be made in Canada for less than $3,000."

His daughter and son-in law travel to the major international bridal shows in New York and Spain to do most of their buying, he says.

Designer labels found at Ritché include Marisa, a New York label; Maggie Sottero from Australia and Amy Michelson from California.

"Amy Michelson is exclusive to our store in Canada," says Ritché. "Nobody else carries her in Canada."

He says the salon has wedding gowns to suit every shape, size and budget. "We have an inventory of over 1,000 gowns. They are fitted to the customer. We have 15 dressmakers to do the fittings."

Jack Ritché has been observing fashion trends for over 50 years. [Barbara Silverstein photos]

Ritché says there have been changes in bridal fashion over the years, noting a few differences: Few brides wear long trains, a slinkier gown is a popular option, mothers of the bride are opting for simpler, less fussy outfits and there is generally less beading. He notes that today's brides are also wearing a lot of cream instead of white, and some even wear dresses with coloured trim and embroidery.

He adds that custom-made gowns that sold for $2,000 in the '60s would cost at least $5,000 to $6,000 to make today. He stresses that with so many designers to choose from, brides don't need to go the custom route anymore.

There are still some customers who opt for custom work, and Ritché takes care of them, doing the fitting and the design. "They make an appointment with me for the fitting and sketches. I do the sketches of the design."

He advises people to allow a minimum of four months to order a custom-made dress.

The factory on Spadina has relocated to Caledonia Road, where five to six seamstresses do alterations and custom work.

Looking back on his long career, Ritché says designing and selling bridal wear has been very gratifying. "It's a happy moment working with brides. My job has always been to please the bride. Over the years, I have received many letters of thanks. It's been a great satisfaction."

Take home a keepsake as a memento of the party

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special To The CJN

While the memories of a simchah often fade with time, having a memento of the event will ensure that your guests will never forget it. Keepsakes are gifts that the guests can take home at the end of the night to add excitement to the party.

One option for event keepsakes is Advertisemint (416-787-6436). The company offers personalized goodies such as candy bars, fortune cookies and water bottles.

Advertisemint, which is a division of Hooplah Interactive, is run by David Lonergan and Leslie Hartsman. They began as DJs who came together as a result of of common interests.

"We combined our different ideas with our knowledge from previous experience," says Lonergan.

Advertisemint customizes their product to meet the customers' needs. "We are different in that… we can come to you and show you our products. That way, you don't have to do all the work," Lonergan says.

The personalized merchandise is extremely popular because the product is so much fun. Virtually anything you choose can be personalized with information about the event and taken home by every guest!

The products are all fully FDA-regulated, so that all the goodies that get sent home with guests are guaranteed to be delicious!

When asked what he enjoys most about his job, Lonergan remarks that "customer service is great because we can mesh ideas together with clients so that we create exactly the product that they want."

Although Lonergan is always busy, he finds time to meet the needs of every client. Advertisemint can deliver a product in two to three weeks and promises excellent service.

> Available for all simchahs and corporate events

They specialize in promotional merchandise, but Advertisemint is available for all simchahs and corporate events.

To learn more about Advertisemint, look them up on the Web at www.advertisemint.com.

Another option for event keepsakes is Fun Pix Digital 905-780-8663, which offers digitally remastered photographs that can be taken of guests at your party. With the help of Fun Pix Digital, your guests can be disco dancers and hockey players, or even transported to the Academy Awards!

Robert Waskul, who runs the company, has been a traditional photographer for 20 years. With the rise of digital photography, he discovered a new medium that gave him freedom to explore more exciting ways of taking pictures.

"With my pictures, we have something tangible that really brings interactive technology into the now," Waskul says. "The guests are taking home a 5 x 7 photograph, but it's a lot different from other photographs."

> Competitive prices as well as fantastic service

Waskul combines his in-depth understanding of photography with the new advantages of digital technology to provide an outstanding product.

"With the new technology, the clients can see the picture as soon as it is ready. This way I get immediate feedback and I can become more involved with the work", says Waskul.

As well as character pictures, Waskul offers what is called a "bordered photograph." The bordered pictures are different because they incorporate the interests of the party-giver into the photograph. For example, if your daughter is an absolute shopaholic, the guests at her bat mitzvah can be pictured surrounded by the street signs of Rodeo Drive and Park Avenue.

Waskul offers competitive prices as well as fantastic service. He works with clients until they are completely satisfied with the product.

His combination of professional photography and fun novelty ideas is unique in event activities. If you are looking to spice up your party, look no further than Fun Pix Digital.

Waskul is available for simchahs and corporate events.

Great bands play the music you want to hear

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When it comes to the rhythm of a party, the band is the backbone, setting the tone and tempo.

That's why you need a band that plays what the guests want to hear when they want to hear it, says Alan Shiner of Nova Sounds.

"We observe the reactions of the crowd," Shiner says. "If a song is working, why not stay with it and keep things going on the floor instead of mechanically changing because you have a set repertoire?"

The repertoire of Nova Sounds is extensive. Shiner estimates the band has learned some 5,000 songs over the years.

"We'll provide a song list and they can add to it… You have to be willing to learn new songs that fit the clients' particular needs," Shiner says.

"We've learned as many as 15 to 20 songs for a particular party."

Consulting with the band to determine everything from the appropriate timing of certain songs to the number of horahs to be played is imperative, says Kenny Simon of his namesake band.

"I usually get together with the client a month or so prior [to the party]," Simon says, noting he will invite potential clients to hear the band play in his studio or provide them with a CD if they request it.

But Simon says an impromptu visit to hear a band at someone else's affair isn't necessarily the best way to select one.

"At [each] individual party, the band is catering to that affair. That may not reflect what [the potential client] is looking for," Simon explains.

These days, it is difficult to generalize what clients are looking for, as music trends change constantly.

Ethnic sounds have gained popularity, but good old fashioned rock 'n' roll and top-40 dance tunes still fill the dance floors.

"Every client I have is totally different," Simon says. "We'll mix it up based on what the client wants."

What's important, says Simon, is for the musicians to be versatile and highly skilled.

To that end, both bands have deep musical and performance expertise.

Shiner has worked with the likes of Mariah Carey and Paul Anka and the band has performed for royalty and prime ministers.

The Kenny Simon Band

Simon has also played for royalty and has had songs hit the charts. The band's drummer has played on both the Tonight Show with Jay Leno and on the Late Show with David Letterman.

While the instrumental skills and voices of the band members are crucial, Shiner advises clients to seek out a band that does more than simply play music.

"We're there to contribute to the energy of the party," Shiner says. "Our vocalists are great dancers and will leave the stage and go into the crowd… when the time is right."

When it comes down to it, Simon and Shiner say experience is invaluable.

"A band with a lot of experience is able to judge the crowd," says Shiner. "They know when a break should be taken and are willing to have volume control. They know when to play the right music at the right time."

To contact Nova Sounds, phone 416-926-1918.

The Kenny Simon Band can be reached at 416-638-2549 or online at www.kennysimonband.com.

Have fun doing your one-stop party shopping

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Shopping for party supplies need not be a chore. Norene Norris, Manager of Tyme to Party (905-737-2789; www.tymetoparty.com), and Sam Cohen of Balloon Bash (905-707-8177; www.balloonbash.com), offer some suggestions on how to make it a pleasure.

Cohen and Norris agree that the major advantage of a one-stop party supplier is convenience. You visit one store and find a multitude of party needs under that roof. This saves you having to travel all over town, and no matter how far ahead you plan, anything that saves time is valuable.

When you're starting to look for a supplier, referrals help: Norris gets 90 per cent of her customers through word of mouth. Before you order anything, though, she maintains, you need to visit the store to see what items they have and know the quality of their service. She invites you to come in, look around, then check out the competition. She's confident you'll choose her.

Choose a supplier who can meet your exact needs, Norris advises. Whether you have a cut-and-dried list or want to do some discussing and planning before you decide what to order, a good one-stop supplier will be flexible, and accommodate you.

Norris and Cohen urge you to look for the best service you can get. Norris goes further: look for someone you feel comfortable with, she says, someone who will be kind to you. Kindness is never out of place, especially considering the stress that goes with organizing a big do.

As Norris puts it, the staff should "guide you, not push you." Quoting her husband Harvey, she says, "I don't want to sell to you. I want you to buy from me."

Staff should guide you, not push you

Asked which is more important, service or goods, Cohen replies that even if you know exactly what you want, service is important – staff should be knowledgeable and helpful. But you may change your mind, and staff should be adaptable, able to deal with the unexpected.

Moreover, Cohen continues, party supplies are diverse enough to be a specialty in their own right. To an unsuspecting customer, such diversity can be bewildering. Customers anticipate that they will need a specialist's help, and for this reason, they tend to value service over goods. If some item is hard to find, but it's out there somewhere, it's excellent service that will find it for you.

"You want three dozen balloons," Cohen says by way of an example, "evenly divided among red, yellow and blue, but do you know just how many shades of each colour are available? And do you know that many balloons are now made to last not just a day or two, but up to three weeks?"

The party's going to be fun, says Norris, so the visit to the store should be fun too.

Chose a supplier who can meet your exact needs

"Kids have a great time at our showroom," she says with a smile, "and so do dads. They get a chance to be kids again. And for us who work here, it's fun to serve you."

You can book anytime you want, Norris says, though it's better to do so as far ahead as you can. This gives you time to change your order.

In the party industry, almost every business seems to have a specialty that makes it not quite the same as its competitors; so try to find a supplier whose specialty areas appeal to you.

Tyme to Party's main area of interest is fun for birthdays, bar/bat mitzvahs and kids' parties. Their specialty is loot bags, but they also offer a huge range of costumes, accessories, giveaways, balloons and paper products, and hilarious things like flashing sunglasses.

Along with balloons, as you'd expect, Balloon Bash offers centrepieces, seasonal baskets and decorations. The company is a member of QBN, Qualatex Balloon Network (www.qualatex.com), which sets standards for the industry, and disseminates creative ideas among its members.

Light up the Night with New Party Lights!

By RICHARD GERSKUP
Special to The CJN

It was not so long ago that outdoor lighting was limited to traditional wall mount and lamp post fixtures. In your choice of black or white finishes only! Nothing fancy. Nothing to enlighten a festive mood.

"Well, you ain't seen nothing yet!" says Bruce Young of Universal Lamp in Toronto. (416-787-8900). Their website is www.greatlighting.com.

"Today, outdoor lighting stretches the imagination with an extraordinary range of landscape lighting, special deck lighting, and most recently, impressive co-ordinated exterior table lamps, floor lamps, chandeliers and fans that will transform your yard or patio into a 'living room'!"

Young adds that some of the newest outdoor lighting products are almost identical to what you'd see inside a house. Much like today's outdoor furniture that has made the leap to a refreshing indoor/outdoor look, these newest lighting products are totally weather-resistant and completely approved for exterior use.

They use regular light bulbs that are fully protected from the elements and feature imaginative fabric "look-alike" shades.

For large festive light shows, look for new torchiere lamps that stake right into the ground; small, deck-top lanterns (copper adornment is especially popular right now); plus a bright assortment of landscape lighting kits that light up the night to create a party atmosphere or an intimate setting.

Light up your outdoors and enjoy the beauty of the night.

Some of the newest outdoor lighting products are almost identical to what you'd see inside.

Beautiful flowers create simplistic elegance

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Flowers create the mood, setting and atmosphere for an event. They bring the element of nature indoors. And according to the owners of Stemz, they should be something unique that your guests have never seen before.

Stemz is a relatively new studio-based business. Started by Fiona Liston and Joanne Winkeleer a little over a year ago, Stemz (416-471-4945) is "all about new ideas.

"We try to steer our clients towards a modern and clean look," says Liston. "Something that's eye-catching and different."

Liston and Winkeleer's goal is to introduce new textures and colours to clients.

"We can do the Martha Stewart, but we want people to try new things in Toronto," says Winkeleer.

Elaine Birnbaum of Greenleaves and Petals (905-709-4080) says she doesn't have one particular style.

"I think we have many different styles because we have a wonderful group of talented designers here," she says.

According to Elaine, the current trend in flowers and decor is clean lines, achieved by using rocks, gems and candles.

"Simplistic elegance," she says. "This can work with dramatic colour or monochromatic colour."

Greenleaves and Petals can coordinate all aspects of an event, including the design of the florals, centrepieces, graphics, signing boards, balloons, catering, chair covers, linens, backdrops and artwork.

"Sometimes people want that," Elaine says. "They don't have time to go to other places – everyone's busy. It takes a lot of pressure off of people."

When Liston and Winkeleer meet with a client, they first go to check out the venue.

"We take into account the colours and textures of the room," Liston says.

"Then we determine what would be the best florals and designs for the event," Winkeleer adds. "We're very personalized."

Elaine says it is important that the florist is familiar with the location, because "not every floral display suits every venue."

Winkeleer suggests clients talk to their florist before choosing a theme for their party.

"We've seen what works and what doesn't," Winkeleer says, "And we can give [clients] ideas."

Elaine says a bar or bat mitzvah theme does not have to be about sports or activities that the child likes.

"Sometimes a theme can be developed by colour or texture, like using bold colours if the bat mitzvah girl is outgoing," she explains. "And sometimes a venue is not conducive to a theme."

Floral design by Stemz

Elaine says she likes to meet the bar and bat mitzvah kids and get them involved in planning their special day. She gives them samples and pictures so that they will feel integrated in the decisions and decor.

She also sets up a sample or "prototype" of what she will create for the party. She then invites the family to see "everything put together, so they have something to look forward to."

When choosing a florist, Winkeleer suggests clients find someone with whom they have a good rapport, similar design sensibilities and a sense of trust.

If the client does not find a florist with these qualities, the client will "always be worrying whether the flowers will turn out."

Winkeleer advises setting aside 10 per cent of the party budget for flowers. Clients should then work with their florist to determine what kind of look they want to achieve.

For a wedding, Winkeleer says a lot of money goes to labour costs, because "everything has to be perfect."

Elaine can tailor what clients want to suit their budget. "You shouldn't feel that if you're not spending, you're going to compromise the look," she says. "You can have a beautiful understated look for less."

Stemz orders flowers specifically for an event, so that they are as fresh as possible.

Liston and Winkeleer schedule only one event per weekend so that they can "take full control" of the party.

"We've both left other businesses because we really want to do this," Liston says. "We have a lot of fun and we put a lot of energy into it."

Winkeleer says clients who want to secure a specific florist for their simchah, should hire the florist six to 12 months prior to the event. Otherwise, three months and upwards is a suitable amount of time.

When clients do not have a lot of time before events such as baby namings, Elaine suggests booking a florist directly after deciding on the venue.

She says she loves when guests walk into the party and get the first glimpse of the flowers and decor.

"When you go into the room and you don't know where to look first because everything's so beautiful, that gives me a lot of pleasure," Elaine says.

Whether your party is in a synagogue, in a banquet hall or at your house, the right flowers will enhance the space, add a touch of elegance and make a statement.

At Stemz and Greenleaves and Petals, new and exciting looks for your party are always blooming.

What's the key to choosing a venue?

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

How do you choose your venue? There are plenty of possibilities. Even a look through the tried-and-true Yellow Pages can be bewildering.

Here are some tips to make the selection easier. Doug Collier of Copper Creek Golf Club (905-893-3370; www.coppercreek.ca), Jeff Roick of The Carlu (416-597-1931; www.thecarlu.com) and Peter Heliopoulos of By Peter and Pauls (905-326-2000; www.bypeterandpauls.com) are all venue professionals.

No two settings are alike and the venue should feel right for you personally. "Pay attention to the style of the place," Heliopoulos advises.

Collier refers to the necessary quality as "comfort," which covers a range of factors, from comfortable chairs to decor and setting that put you at ease.

Size is important, says Heliopoulos. For a gala, you want a big hall, but the setting for an intimate event shouldn't be too large. The venue should be adaptable for different numbers of guests.

Adaptability, in Collier's view, helps the venue build clientele. If you like the place that hosted a family party, he explains, and they can also do a wedding, you're likely to choose them over other locations. Or, if you've found a venue that hosted a great power breakfast or board meeting, it saves time to use the same place for the company's year-end bash.

Roick believes you might rank priorities differently, depending on the kind of event. Whereas budget might rank higher for a personal or social event, a location that suits the corporate image, and has good audio-visual facilities, may claim top priority for a business function.

If you don't have a big decor budget, Roick advises, choose a setting that's beautiful without any embellishment. If, on the other hand, you're putting on a themed event, pick a venue with neutral decor, a blank canvas for you to work on.

If you want something extra, you pay for it, Heliopoulos says. However, he adds, you should get quality even within a modest budget.

Take your guests into consideration, Roick continues. How many are coming from out of town? And how are they getting here? Will they prefer easy access to the airport or closeness to downtown night life? Is there plenty of parking?

Of course, you want excellent rapport with the staff. Both Collier and Roick insist that rapport is vital; Heliopoulos ranks it number 1. Hall management and staff have to make things run smoothly and deal with glitches and the unpredictable. If they're motivated, there's almost no obstacle they can't overcome.

For small home parties hosted by a friend or family member, it's a given that your event will be one of a kind. Once you go outside home and family to hire party professionals, though, as Collier points out, you'll want to make sure they treat your event as unique.

Because the venue sets the tone, you'll want to pick a special place. Two venues couldn't contrast more than Copper Creek and The Carlu; and Heliopoulos founded By Peter and Pauls as an umbrella company for five venues (all with free parking) and several entertainment companies.

Cut into the Humber River valley, Copper Creek Golf Club offers a view for all seasons overlooking the Doug Carrick golf course, with year-round natural beauty. The clubhouse is well-appointed, with a stonework exterior and copper roof.

The Carlu, at the old Eaton's College Street store, is downtown and proud of it. Roick calls it "a destination, not just a venue." It's been renamed for its architect, Jacques Carlu, a proponent of the Art Moderne style, designer of the Île de France and Normandie ocean liners.

The Carlu's concert hall, re-opened after being closed for decades, was the first North American attempt to combine entertainment with retailing. In its heyday, it featured stars like Duke Ellington and Billie Holiday.

Cityplace Golf, By Peter and Pauls' newest venue, hosts up to 350 guests and is Toronto's only downtown golf course. The company's other venues are Delano's Restaurant, the Bellaggio banquet hall, the Paramount and the Manor. The different rooms can host from 100 to 1,650 people.

By Peter and Pauls' Paramount is state of the art in everything from exterior to kosher kitchen. There are permanent pizza ovens, ice cream wells and coffee stations in the lobbies. The Manor, north of King City at the Carrying Place Golf & Country Club, overlooks a six-acre pond.

Heliopoulos also has an advertising and design company, a videographer and other party-related businesses. Besides offering complete services to clients, these companies are an ongoing source of new ideas – letting Heliopoulos be a party generalist, while drawing on specialist expertise.

One final word of advice from Roick: "Pay attention to the details of your contract. Go in with open eyes; and read the fine print!"

Nobody wants to bog down in detail, but attention to what seems petty today can save tsuris down the road. Some venues with paintings, for instance, have a no-baloons policy, because helium harms some works of art.

Caterers keep up with the times

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Caterers of kosher food are keeping up with the times and with the latest food trends, offering vegetarian, low fat and low carbohydrate options.

GMB Culinary Productions (416-789-7811, www.gmbculinary.com) is celebrating its 10th year as a trendsetter in the Canadian kosher food industry.

Specializing in nouveau kosher cuisine, GMB is staffed by foodies who are passionate about food, says Jared Bensky, GMB's director of business development.

The company recently hired an in-house dietitian to create a kosher menu of low fat and low carbohydrate items.

"We pride ourselves on being knowledgeable about the latest consumer taste and trends," Bensky says.

GMB Culinary caters to 35 venues across the province, from Muskoka to Toronto and the Niagara Region. In Toronto, the company's venues include both locations of the InterContinental Hotel, the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, Le Royal Meridian King Edward Hotel and the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

Bensky advises people to look for caterers who have experience and a good reputation and use the best ingredients, rather than shopping for the most competitive price.

"A lot of people go price shopping, and they're not comparing apples to apples," he says.

Operating side by side with GMB Culinary is Gorman McIlveen Special Event Design and Management, which can provide just about everything needed for a party, including floral design, décor, lighting and rentals of linens and table settings – everything, that is, except the food.

Since the catering company and the event management company are in sync, they offer one-stop shopping for special events. "We design the whole event from soup to nuts," Bensky says, "from valet parking to audio visual, to sound and to wait staff."

Aside from catering private parties, GMB Culinary caters to events held by the corporate sector and charitable groups. The United Jewish Appeal is one of the company's clients.

"We provide them with dozens of events, from small meetings in-house, at the Lipa Green Building, to their major donor events at the Royal York," he says.

GMB's kosher-plated meal program allows those who keep kosher to dine with their colleagues in the city's upscale restaurants. GMB supplies kosher meals to the top 50 restaurants in Toronto, as well as to the corporate offices of two of Canada's major banks.

"We provide a frosted glass plate with stainless steel flatware," Bensky says, "so the guest is able to blend with other people and not feel they're eating an airline meal."

The GMB Culinary time-saver program offers home delivery of delicious Shabbat dinners, and GMB is launching a new weekly home delivery service of a shopping list of fresh prepared foods.

GMB's baked goods can be found at the Whole Foods Market, Pusateri's and Longo's, as well as on sweet tables at events the company caters. Most people purchasing GMB bakery products at retail locations buy them because they're dairy free, Bensky says, not because they're kosher.

Every GMB Culinary and Gorman McIlveen Special Event Design and Management function is special and different by design and menu, he says.

"Based on this, we exceed our client's expectations each time."

Tri Elm Caterers prides itself on being ahead of the times, offering the latest in food trends, whether they are low fat or vegetarian, before their customers request them.

"We want to be ahead of the game," says Joe Elmaleh of Tri Elm Caterers (416-222-1230). "We're always going to food shows to see different ideas and implement them in our menus."

A large, kosher menu, which changes every six months, can be viewed on the Tri Elm website (www.trielm.com). Many of Tri Elm's customers are referrals who don't necessarily want to eat the same food that they ate at their friends' wedding. "We don't want to be served what has been served in the last year or two," Elmaleh says.

Tri Elm's menu is a guideline, he emphasizes, to give people an idea of what they can do. "Every customer puts a personal touch on the menu. We constantly customize menus to fit clients' themes and taste buds."

Elmaleh says grilled food is more popular than baked food these days. His chefs are using the grill a lot, for vegetables and steaks, along with fresh herbs, another current food trend. People continue to stay away from sauces, and although chicken and fish are still in demand, they are given an exotic flavouring during preparation. Lamb and veal are requested frequently, as is Tri Elm's specialty English rib steak.

Tri Elm Caterers' executive chef Saverio has 30 years' experience in the food industry and has travelled around the world, including to France, Spain and Morocco.

"With his travelling, he's worked at various places in these countries and has learned there," Elmaleh says. "He brings an Italian flavour to kosher catering, and French and Middle Eastern."

Tri Elm has a pastry chef on staff, which "gives us a choice to be very creative with our desserts and sweet tables," Elmaleh says. The latest addition to sweet tables is a candy table at which party-goers can make their own candy skewers.

Elmaleh says anyone hiring a caterer should know that the service is as important as the meal.

Since the caterer's bill for an event is 60 per cent of the cost, the caterer ought to be part of the function, he says. "The caterer should be someone to lean on. They need someone that's in it day to day, to be able to guide them, not just sell them a meal."

Besides the food, Tri Elm provides linens and table settings, although they don't offer FLOP – catering industry terminology for flowers, liquor, orchestra and pictures.

Tri Elm Caterers operates out of several locations, including the Pride of Israel Synagogue. Their newest venue is the Pearson Convention Centre, 15 minutes away from the Promenade Mall.

Tri Elm, which has been catering for 14 years, is a team of people who work together as equals, Elmaleh says.

"We put the customer ahead of everyone else and make their function as one of our own."

For menswear, 'the tailored look is in'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In the men's fashion world, tailors see the full range of body types from the tall and sinewy to the short and plump, but regardless of the size, there is a universal maxim.

"You want to make a bad figure look good and a good figure look great," says Wendy Myles, paraphrasing for her husband Lou of Lou Myles Disegnatore.

"The silhouette is what flatters everyone's body."

With that cardinal rule, Lou Myles has custom tailored for an international clientele for 60 years, from the likes of Frank Sinatra to Shaquille O'Neal.

Myles says well known labels and no names are essentially cut from the same cloth and the actual design of the suit is what counts.

"The construction of the suit is what makes it look so good for so long," he says, adding that he recently did some alterations for a client who is still wearing a suit made by Myles in 1973.

Stars Men's Shop

Agreeing with Myles' assessment that the slim cut look is stylish is Kapil Khan of Stars Men's Shop.

"The tailored look is in," says Khan, adding that pin stripes and pastel colours are also gaining steam, especially in the summer months.

Another trend Khan has seen of late is for the groom to wear a tuxedo, while the groomsmen are attired in black suits.

That can also be economical, as the groomsmen will then have a suit they can wear to countless other affairs, Khan advises.

Key advice for suit shoppers is to find a knowledgeable and trained salesperson, say both Khan and Myles.

"They have be very courteous and they have to have great knowledge," says Myles, noting his company frequently delivers clothes right to the front door.

Myles says it's important for the salesperson to find out what the client does for a living, as certain styles are appropriate for particular professions.

Khan says salespeople at Stars Men's stores are trained to measure clients to ensure that if alterations are required, the final product is comfortable.

To that end, Khan says many of the Stars Men's stores have in-house tailors, which allows for a quick, two-day turn around to complete alterations.

"For a wedding, it's not a problem to come in a week and a half prior," he says, although early preparation isn't a bad idea.

With a custom tailor shop boasting 20 employees, Myles says he has the resources to make the hand-crafted and hand finished suit a perfect fit.

"A custom made suit is made properly," he says.

To contact Lou Myles, phone 905-738-6700 or log onto www.loumyles.ca.

To reach Stars Men's Shop, dial 416-650-1404 or online at www.starsmenshops.com.

Rentals are the best way to go

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

The larger your party, the more likely you are to need to rent items ranging from fine crystal to temporary flooring.

John Higgins, vice-president of sales and marketing at Higgins Party Rentals (416-252-4050, www.higginspartyrentals.com), and Mary Crothers, president of Chair-Man Mills Inc. (416-391-0400, www.chairmanmills.com), offer useful advice on choosing a rental company.

The main function of rentals, Crothers says, is to make things easier. "Think of an event like a seder. You can rent the dishes and send them back dirty. And it's especially easy with a one-stop rental house, where you find all the furniture and other accessories for your party under one roof."

If you're not familiar with party rentals or party professionals in general, Higgins recommends using the old-fashioned Yellow Pages. Many companies that advertise there will outline the services they offer and tell you how long they have been operating.

Higgins, whose company has been in business 23 years, advises choosing a supplier with a long track record. In a competitive business where referrals make or break you, staying power is a testimonial in its own right. Moreover, he adds, a long track record means a wealth of contacts in the party industry and related fields, which may be of extra help in making your party a success.

"We have plenty of corporate clients," Higgins says, "but we built the company on this philosophy of service to the individual, and we're keeping to it." He goes on to suggest that a family business like his is most likely to adhere to this philosophy.

Chair-Man Mills too owes much of its growth to the family trade. It is also a family business, one that has rented party furniture since 1911 and has branched out into dishes and other accessories. Its philosophy too is one of hands-on personal attention to each customer.

"The staff should know their company's products, and be eager to help you," Crothers says.

Service, for Crothers, means being on hand when needed, including the day of your event. It also means being open on weekends and for emergencies. Just knowing help is there, even if you don't have to call on it, can ease your mind.

Look for reasonable prices and wide selection, Higgins suggests, but since you want the best quality you can afford, prices shouldn't be too low. Crothers agrees with this. "Don't go for a low price," she warns, "if it means service is poor."

Bringing the spa to your party

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Spa and party: the two usually don't mix. But Spa Party has put an end to that. Fashion-conscious hosts and hostesses can now bring the spa to bridal showers, bar mitzvahs, corporate events and cottage parties.

The recently launched mobile spa company that has been featured on Breakfast Television and EZRock 97.3 provides pedicures, manicures, massages, facials and other spa services to clients "wherever they might be," says owner Rob Weingust (416-926-1934, www.spapartyevents.com).

Spas are typically a place where people receive treatments individually, Weingust explains. As a result, hosting a bridal shower at a spa, for example, can be frustrating because the group can't be together. With Spa Party, a group can enjoy spa services and their get-together at the same time.

Instead of a full manicure or pedicure, Spa Party's estheticians may offer mini-manicures and pedicures for the group. At a corporate event or bar mitzvah, the massage therapists may offer a mini-massage or a chair massage instead of a full-body massage, so guests don't have to undress or worry about ruining their hair or make-up.

The staff – registered massage therapists and estheticians – also cater to the specific needs of a bridal shower.

"They make sure that one hand is free to eat chocolate sushi, or sip a cosmopolitan," Weingust says jokingly.

Most people who attend spa parties tend to be female and between the ages of 20 and 60. He has already done several 30th and 40th birthday parties, and with cottage season coming up, he has booked several parties in cottage country.

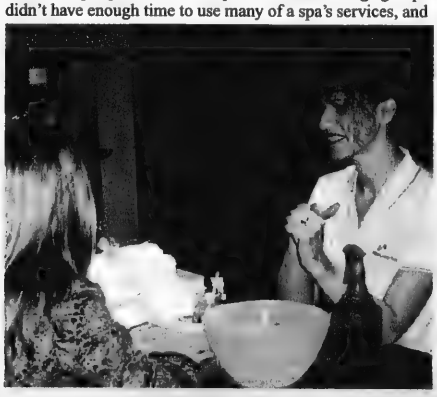
As the word "party" suggests, Spa Party only accepts bookings for groups of five and larger. Weingust encourages customers to take a look at his website first. He also emphasizes that Spa Party can customize services to accommodate different types of parties, budgets and group sizes. So if you want longer, more private sessions at your party, Weingust assures that it's possible.

If you want a room set up with a certain look, that's possible too. "We can decorate the place where the spa is held, from your living room to the ballroom at the Royal York hotel," says Weingust.

Weingust got the idea for Spa Party while working in the meeting and event industry. Two of the things that groups always wanted, he remembers, were spas and golf. Golf was easy because golf courses were equipped to handle large volumes. Spas posed more of a problem because large groups didn't have enough time to use many of a spa's services, and spas usually already had bookings and couldn't accommodate a group. Plus spas are pricey.

"Spa Party is cheaper than going to the spa as well," Weingust says.

Spa Party's staff are registered therapists and estheticians.



Amongst the different services offered is a manicure.

On the other hand, Crothers says, if the selection ranges from basic to deluxe, you should get quality service and supplies even on a moderate budget. With any reputable rental house, you can set a better table.

Higgins emphasizes the point that a visit to the showroom will tell you how eager the company is to earn your business. Look for a wide selection, quality goods and knowledgeable, helpful staff. The more important the event, the more money you're spending, he says, the more you need this personal contact.

Crothers says the rental house should also show you pictures of events where they have worked.

"Usually," Higgins says, "people who come to one of our showrooms [in Toronto and Oakville] choose us as their supplier.

"When you entertain, you want to celebrate. For celebration, the stress has to be low. To keep it low, spend the extra time and care now, choosing and working with your party suppliers, and save yourself worries when the big day comes."

Different companies have their specialties. Higgins, for example, in addition to renting the expected party items, has just bought Blue Sky Tents, and specializes in tents and all the outdoor furniture and accessories that go with them, including flooring.

Crothers places a lot of importance on versatility. For Chair-Man Mills, this includes experience in kosher service, satisfying observant clients.

"Choose a rental house which can handle any size event from 30 guests to thousands," Crothers says, "and one which will offer you anything from a single item to a whole party package. This will enable you to use the same supplier for different events, and develop a long-term relationship."

Mr. Disc Jockey: The Pied Piper of your party

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

At bar and bat mitzvahs, interactive entertainers from Edwin Allen Productions can bridge the gap between a disc jockey – a human jukebox – and a live band.

Ed McMurtry, who heads Mister Disc Jockey and Edwin Allen Productions (1-877-473-3800, www.mrdj.com), says his interactive entertainers are party motivators who get everyone participating. "We do it in a fast-paced, elegant way. We're called Pied Pipers, the way we bring people to the dance floor."

His entertainers come along with a set or backdrop and, with the addition of some lively patter, entertain within the context of a choreographed evening.

A band that plays well enough to provide the many types of music required at a bar or bat mitzvah is usually beyond the average family's budget, McMurtry says. His entertainers can give clients the range of music they need, from energetic dance music to hits of the 1950s and '60s and horas, while staying within budget.

His interactive entertainers never single out the mother or father of the guest-of-honour to do an embarrassing skit, he says, nor do they dangle prizes such as chrome scooters or trucker hats to get guests onto the dance floor.

The entertainers work within the moment, with what's happening at the function at any particular time. "We don't ever stop the music to do a cheesy routine or some contrived interactive number," McMurtry says. "Each one of our entertainers has more interactive material up their sleeve than time will permit at an event."

A great entertainer may elicit only polite applause at a bar or bat mitzvah but when you bring bubbie out the applause is amazing, he says.

Professional dancers who perform in some of Toronto's major musical productions are part of the Edwin Allen Productions team. The dancers are included in the choreographed, theatrical events that are the company's trademark. The dancers may be dressed as ice kings and queens, McMurty says, or they may, as they did at one party, be wearing glow-in-the-dark costumes and lead the guests into the party in the dark.

Edwin Allen Productions received a Canadian events industry award for the most spectacular event under $40,000. For a bat mitzvah for a girl named Laura, the company won an award for best entertainment for a private individual.

At Laura's bat mitzvah, the guests gathered for cocktails on a soundstage in a movie studio. There they were greeted by three buskers, who were dressed and made up as a mechanical Mountie, a pantomime juggler and Charlie Chaplin.

"When it was time to leave cocktails and go to the main event, Charlie Chaplin ushered the guests to the freight elevator," McMurtry says. "The freight elevator lowered the guests into a misty pool of dry ice. When they left the freight elevator, they walked onto the main sound stage, which was decorated as a starry night."

After eating the first course of their meal, the young people returned to the first soundstage, where they spent an hour dancing in an environment that was retrofitted to resemble Studio 54. The scene on the smaller soundstage was beamed down to the adults, who were dancing on the main soundstage.

A registry takes the guesswork out of buying a gift

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Gift registries used to be only for china, glassware and other table setting items, but times have changed. A good idea, once it's out there, is bound to expand sooner or later.

Partners Carmela Bozzo and Josie Restivo of Desiree China & Gifts (905-850-2818; www.desiree.ca) and spokesperson Lisa Gibson of Canadian Tire (1-800-387-8803; www.canadiantire.ca) represent companies that offer quite different products. Both Bozzo and Gibson, however, agree that a registry makes life simpler for everyone.

A gift registry is a list where you specify the items you want to receive from your wedding guests. As items are purchased, they are checked off the list by the store you registered with. Aside from this, details vary from company to company. Canadian Tire, for instance, lets guests give cards that are like gift certificates.

> A gift registry is a list that specifies the items you want to receive from your wedding guests

In most registries, you can also specify brand names, designs, etc., as well as the priority of some items over others. Also, registries are now used for anniversaries and other milestone events.

You can see the advantages, as Bozzo and Gibson point out, both for you and your guests: you get what you want, because they know what to buy. Gibson adds that a well-run registry will also allow you to change your plans and make updates.

Take the trouble to register early, Bozzo says, and you save trouble later. Instead of duplication and unmatched or missing pieces, you get full, matched place settings of flatware and stemware, in the designs and price range you want.

While many people still think of tableware as a woman's concern, Bozzo sees more and more men taking an interest nowadays, especially when it's time to make final decisions.

"Just as women do," she observes, "men like to pick dishes and utensils up, to see how they feel in the hand."

Gibson sees a lot of couples too. "A lot of our products," she says, "define things couples like to do together, like cooking, camping or taking road trips."

Websites add to the convenience of a registry, Bozzo and Gibson say. A website is like an old-fashioned catalogue with its plethora of pictures, but with the advantage of speedy, regular updates and more interesting graphics. Even so, as Gibson points out, nothing beats the pleasure of coming into a store or showroom and handling things.

To work at all, a registry has to be well organized. In addition, Bozzo and Gibson advise, insist on a high standard of full, personal service. Staff should be courteous and knowledgeable, and along with an overall helpful attitude, there should be procedures in place, to ensure that you get maximum benefit from that knowledge.

At Desiree, staff walk you through every item on your gift list, so that you know all the choices available to you. Then they set up a table in the store, to show you how your choices will look together.

Desiree also provides a card to go with your invitations, to let your guests know you are registered at this store. They offer free gift wrapping, and they deliver free to a bridal shower on the same day, or to your home afterward.

One advantage of Canadian Tire's registry highlighted by Gibson is a range of price points to accommodate every budget, from a few dollars up. For expensive items, say a state-of-the-art barbecue with all the accoutrements, you can make a partial contribution.

The Canadian Tire registry lets you order from anywhere in the world, as long as the delivery address is in Canada. And with 452 stores across Canada, returns are easy.

Videographers create a visual memory of your party

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Every party should create lasting memories, but those who want a more visual reminder of the experience can rely on a videographer.

"Video is very important for a party," says Abe Salzman of Video Affairs (905-889-0909, www.video-affairs.com). "It captures the decor, food, music, atmosphere, speeches and all of the friends and family."

Salzman, who has been in the videography business for 23 years, says videos become an "important keepsake," especially for older people, such as grandparents.

Video Affairs specializes in filming weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs. Salzman says his company has also done corporate work, training videos, music videos and seminars.

He says most people want every aspect of their party caught on tape, although all clients have the opportunity to decide exactly what they would like their video to include.

"Most people like to start with pictures and end with flashbacks," Salzman says. "They may also choose music, special effects and 3-D animation."

Salzman says his clients can even participate in the editing process, if they want.

While the videos he and his team put together are primarily for the interests and wishes of their clients, Salzman says he finds personal satisfaction in the reactions and feedback he receives for his work.

"What I like the most is watching the tears in my clients' eyes when they watch some of their video when they come to pick it up," he says. "Their compliments really make my day."

Salzman says his clients know he puts his heart into capturing events in a creative way, and he will do whatever it takes to make his videos shine.

"I try to encourage close family members who are not inclined to dance, to do so, for even a few seconds, just for the memory of being close to the person the party is for," he says.

"Unlike other companies that usually videotape from a tripod, I like to capture faces and emotions by being inside the action with the camera on my shoulder," he adds.

This filming technique is what gives Salzman's videos a unique look and feel, he says. Because he positions himself among the crowd, guests have a chance to speak to the camera and record their own messages.

For clients that prefer Salzman to stay on the sidelines, it's "no problem." He says he will do his very best job nonetheless.

Videos shot and produced by Video Affairs vary in cost, depending on the clients' budget and taste and what they would like to see on film, Salzman says. The company has prices as low as $995, which includes the entire event on DVD.

Their motto is "perfection at affordable prices," and Salzman says Video Affairs lives up to its claim.

For those who prefer an alternative to the "bells and whistles" that Video Affairs advertises, Memory Path Productions (416-785-3758, www.memorypathproductions.com) may be your best bet.

Mair Musafiya says his company has a different approach than others, in that Memory Path Productions is not "all about glamour. It shows real life."

He and his award-winning team film at "life cycle events" such as bar and bat mitzvahs, graduations, weddings, anniversaries and retirement parties.

Musafiya's company may be new, but he says his experience goes back to his days in Yugoslavia, where he worked as a television producer.

He says the original mission of Memory Path Productions was to create family biographies. His company's motto, "Those should not forget," alludes to Musafiya's vision that such videos are "links to the past."

Musafiya says the motto can just as easily refer to the parties he tapes, for "in capturing the past, memories of the future are preserved."

Memory Path Productions has a variety of packages to offer its clients, says Musafiya, who explains that they "treat the event as an entire day."

Abe Salzman

He says pre-shot videos can be played at an event, where, for example, friends and family reflect upon a bride or groom.

All videos are digitally edited and treated like television documentaries, Musafiya says. As well, professional, high-end cameras are used and brand new wireless microphones have been purchased.

Music, digital effects and a DVD with chapters can all be included in a video package.

"We fit every budget and we're very flexible," Musafiya says.

So if you're planning a party and want the action to last a lifetime, remember to turn to the pros.

As Salzman says, people are usually so caught up in the event that "they not only enjoy seeing everything again, but they also get to realize how much they actually missed."

Interactive entertainers are party motivators

Laura didn't want to make a speech at her bat mitzvah. To replace her speech, McMurtry staged a Broadway-style musical, complete with dancers. The musical included Britney Spears, Marilyn Monroe and Madonna routines, a number about the competitive rivalry between Laura and her siblings, performed by her siblings, and a number about how much Laura loves her parents.

It took three days to set up Laura's bat mitzvah. But an event staged by Edwin Allen Productions doesn't have to be costly, McMurtry stressed. "Creativity goes a long way. We can take a modest budget and make it a spectacular event."

Edwin Allen staff works with the caterer, the videographer and other party professionals to ensure that functions run smoothly. "We make life for a lot of event co-ordinators very easy," McMurtry says. "Behind the scenes, we make them look good."

He encourages his prospective clients to look at vast amounts of video of some of his company's past functions. "They can take a look at what they like and at what they don't like," he says. "What's right for one family, isn't right for another."

Sue Rosenblat had her son's bar mitzvah at the Hockey Hall of Fame two years ago. She says she held the event there for the availability of games. Because her son was quiet, and not a dancer, she had decided against a dinner-dance. At the last minute, though, Rosenblat changed her mind about the dancing and called McMurtry for help.

"It was a real party atmosphere created by his entertainers. They really do entertain," she says. "Everyone was up on the dance floor, even those who are reluctant. Because of that, I didn't look anywhere else for my daughter's bat mitzvah."

Rosenblat is having her daughter's bat mitzvah at Casa Loma, where the party area is made up of three rooms – the Great Hall, the library and the conservatory. The conservatory is usually used for dancing, but McMurty had concerns about sound bouncing off the glass in the room. He suggested that the dance floor be in the library, where dinner takes place. "He is very familiar with venues in Toronto," Rosenblat says, "and what can and can't be done."

> 'What's right for one family, isn't right for another'

McMurtry got into the party-entertainment field after taking a professional disc jockey course in 1982, at the age of 22. He worked at the business part-time in the '80s, starting Mister Disc Jockey in 1988, and went full-time in 1990. In 1992, he launched Edwin Allen Productions.

Based in Newmarket, Ont., McMurtry's companies are made up of a production staff of 35, including choreographer Carol Ford, bar and bat mitzvah specialist and webmistress Laurie Rose, singer and actor Paul Saunders and technical engineer Al Oldham, who is responsible for the dazzling special effects at their events.

The team's latest bat mitzvah extravaganza is Ashley's Cotton Club. For it, they are creating an art deco environment. Gangsters will frisk guests at the door and the guests will be greeted by ushers wearing '50s-style pillbox hats. To add a contemporary twist, the opening number is Roxy, from the musical Chicago, with the name changed to Ashley.

McMurtry says entertainment has a high priority in Jewish culture and so the success of an event in the community depends largely on the quality of the entertainment. "If you have great entertainment, you'll have a great party. For some people, you're seventh on the list after flowers, but in the Jewish community you're Number One on the list."

Handwriting expert a great judge of character

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

"Looking for a fun, positive entertainer who can amaze and make people laugh and feel good no matter what the event? You've found her!"

Her advertisement alone speaks volumes about her potential, but it is not until you witness Elaine Charal's talents that you can entirely appreciate her powers.

Charal is a certified graphologist — in simpler terms, a master at handwriting analysis — whose company, Positive Strokes (416-446-2903), has been in business over 13 years.

A leader in her profession, Charal can "do far more personal, individual analyses at an event than any other entertainer," she says.

At bar and bat mitzvahs, birthday parties, lunches, dinners, trade shows, sales meetings, conventions, galas and "every event where people come to enjoy," Charal says her analyses are a "positive activity and an excellent ice-breaker."

Elaine Charal, above, and in caricature, right

Charal will even add sparkle to an event by matching a sequined jacket to the party's colour scheme.

She says she will customize a sentence geared to the theme of an event on the client's own letterhead. Each participant will copy the sentence onto a sheet, and after three to five minutes of private analysis, guests will leave with a write-up of their session.

"The paper is a mirror of their personality," says Charal.

And I can attest to that.

After meeting with Charal to see the woman at work, I was quite impressed with her interpretation of my penmanship.

After examining my printing of "My 't's 'and 'd's' tell tall tales about me and my handwriting," Charal could conclude that I am "very single minded," "a free spirit," and a go-getter.

She says my stick letter "l's" show I am "factual" and a "realist." My large lower-case letters show I am "a strong person in a soft manner." The sharp points in my letters show I am "investigative." And the wide spaces between my words show I "will not be intimidated."

That is just a taste of what one client has called "analytical wizardry into the psyche of the signature."

Charal says at parties her analyses are light and uplifting. While the majority of activities at bar and bat mitzvahs are geared toward children, she says her station is "a nice perk for the adults as well as the kids."

Charal says handwriting analysis attracts both males and females, and people will "linger at the function for a longer time" because they are interested in her craft.

Charal says she tries to work within people's budgets when quoting her prices, but for corporate or private events, she usually charges between $100 to $150 per hour.

Aside from specializing in handwriting analysis, Charal is a keynote speaker who gives "upbeat" and "original" lectures to companies.

Her talk, "The Power of the Pen," is guaranteed to have guests "laughing out loud," she says.

The program has served corporate, association and individual clients "who seek to enhance self-understanding and effective communications," says Charal.

In her presentation, Charal identifies leadership traits and aptitudes from the writing of audience members and uses humour "to show how foibles and fears can be turned into strengths," she says.

Charal has appeared on several television stations, including CTV, CITY TV, Global, WTN and CHCH.

Charal says potential clients can fax their writing to her for analysis, which will not only fascinate, but "demonstrate how much fun their participants will have."

For those who want to adjust their writing to bring change to their lives, Charal has tips worth noting:

• If the lines of your writing gently ascend on the page, you are broadcasting your optimism.

• Joining your t-bars to the next letter and forming figure-eights with "g's", "f's" and "s's" indicates your fluidity of mind and your ability to think on your feet.

• If you use stand-alone t-bars, making them firm demonstrates strong willpower, while making them long shouts enthusiasm.

• If you underscore your name with one firm line moving from left to right, you are showing self reliance.

• Straight downstrokes on your "y's" indicate your determination.

There's no party without music

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Finding just the right music can be a crucial factor in the success of an event. Since music can set the tone of a party, it is important to find the most enjoyable entertainment for your guests.

If you are looking for a unique way to get your party going, you have many different yet amazing choices to consider. Two of them are Bais Groove (416-486-8417, www.baisgroove.com) and Superior Sound (416-745-0808, www.superiorsound.ca).

Bais Groove, which began as a group of music-loving friends, offers a youthful and innovative kind of entertainment.

The group started out playing music at events for organizations such as the United Jewish Appeal, and found that many people enjoyed their performances as much as they did.

"People were having such a good time with our music that they'd ask us if we'd perform at their simchah," says David Bloom, the band's percussionist.

Bais Groove expanded into a company that offers entertainment for many different kinds of events. The group can provide everything from an eight-piece band to klezmer music to a cocktail pianist for a smaller event. They can even mix it up many times in a single evening.

"We'll keep our young, Israeli vibe with a set of live music, then we can change to DJs and play music for the kids. We can do it all," Bloom says.

He refers to the group as a "one-stop shop" for entertainment. "Everyone in the band wears two different hats. For example, our guitar player is also a very talented DJ, and has been for quite some time."

Bais Groove perform recently at the Shuk In The Park festival.

Bais Groove is a great choice for simchahs because they offer such a dynamic mix. Their blend of Israeli culture and youthful, live music is unique to them.

"We truly enjoy playing Jewish music and being part of people's simchahs", says Bloom.

Bais Groove is currently offering a 10 per cent discount on bookings after the UJA walkathon.

Superior Sound has been a fixture in Montreal for the past 18 years. New to Toronto this year, the group is already responding to many requests from a growing number of fans in the city.

Superior Sound has a fresh approach to DJ entertainment, based on completely customizing the party to fit the needs of the client. "We can really fit any party," says Jordan Morra, who runs the company.

The simchahs they entertain at are fully interactive. The DJs and dancers go into the crowd to create a more exciting party. The parties have even been referred to as "the world's most high-energy aerobics class," Morra says.

Superior Sound's success is also due to their technical background. "The calibre of equipment used for large events can now be offered at a private level," says Morra. "They way we set up for a party is very pleasing to the eye because we use different equipment than usual."

Since Superior Sound is new to the Toronto scene, they offer "a breath of fresh air" to simchahs, he says. "We get the formalities such as candlelighting and speeches out of the way so we can really party Montreal-style."

When asked what he enjoys most about his job, Morra says, "Developing a creative concept with clients and then working to achieve their goals is great because they are really happy with the party in the end."

The company is dedicated to satisfying the client's every need.

"Your guests are superior, your event should be nothing less."

Although Superior Sound specializes in bar and bat mitzvahs, they are available for weddings and corporate events as well.

Let others do the work to make your kids' party memorable

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Your child's birthday's coming up and you're scratching your head trying to think of a birthday party venue that will pass muster for you and your child.

You've sworn off house parties – not that there's anything wrong with house parties – and you don't have the energy to run a bowling or laser tag party for 20 screaming kids.

Well, there are other options for birthday party-challenged parents and those looking for an exciting and creative venue to wow their young guests.

Two birthday party companies offering original programming and, best of all, assistants to run the parties are Loots (416-787-5668), located at 896 Eglinton Ave. W. near Bathurst Street, and the Wonderful World of Circus (905-479-2411), at 2600 John St., unit 204, in Markham.

Photographers ensure your memories last a lifetime

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

After the party is over and the food and flowers are gone, all that remains behind are the pictures.

That is why both Greg Dean (416-784-4488) of Signature Studios and Taralea Cutler (416-277-2493) of eyecontact photography. say photography is the most important aspect of the party.

"It's as important as the wedding ring and the marriage itself," says Cutler. "It's a lasting impression of a piece of time."

When choosing a photographer for a special event, Dean suggests checking the style of the pictures and the personality of the photographer.

"You're going to be working with the person for eight to 14 hours a day," Dean says. "The better the connection, the easier it goes."

Dean says it is extremely important for the client to have a good rapport with the photographer. The client will feel more relaxed and the photographer will be able to take better pictures.

"The photographer can get more out of people that way," he says."Otherwise it feels like work."

Cutler says a great way for a couple to get acquainted with the style of the photographer before the wedding, is to have engagement photos taken. This allows the couple to become comfortable with the photographer.

According to Dean, communication between the client and photographer is necessary so that both remain "on the same page.

"I have to make sure I'm giving them what they want, and not what I think they want," Dean says.

Signature Studios has three styles, traditional, casual and funky.

"That way there's something for bubbie, something for the parents, and something for the bride and groom," Dean says.

"You gotta make sure that bubbie's happy too," he laughs.

Dean is proud that Signature Studios sends two photographers to a wedding, one for the portraits and one for the candid shots.

He explains that it's important to have both kinds of pictures when putting together an album after the simchah.

When Dean's company shoots more than one bar or bat mitzvah in a family, they make sure that the style and location of the pictures are different so that the children do not look the same in each one.

Signature Studios is heavily involved in the Jewish community. They take school pictures for United Synagogue Day School, prom pictures for Associated Hebrew Day School, and do charity work for the UJA, JCC, and Zareinu.

"We give back to the community," Dean says.

Cutler says eyecontact photography specializes in weddings and special events.

"We take a fly-on-the wall perspective," Cutler says. "We're unobtrusive, we enjoy standing back and watching, but we're also aggressive enough about getting the shot.

"It's about capturing the moment," she adds.

According to Cutler, clients should book a photographer six months to one year before their simchah.

Cutler advises asking if the photographer uses film or takes digital pictures. She suggests clarifying this before meeting with the photographer so that no one's time is wasted.

Cutler's company shoots with film, because they believe it has a better quality, and "stands the test of time."

Clients should also ask if a photographer is flexible, can stay later if needed, and if he or she shoots in black and white film, colour film or both.

Both Dean and Cutler are passionate about their work, and believe that a simchah is not complete without photography.

Even though the party might be over in a flash, the memories from the picture will last a lifetime.

Kids' parties are best held away from your home

Loots, which has built its reputation specializing in themed loots bags, has also been in the party business for some time, says owner David Leese. He stresses that the parties, which are held on the Loots premises on Eglinton, are original and interactive.

"For girls, we've really done it like a mini-bat mitzvah driven by dancing and prizes. There's dance, movement and karaoke. We've brought DJ entertainment to the children's birthday party business."

For boys, Club Loots offers "extreme video and sports," Leese says. "We have video machines, but we also want the kids to be more interactive. We do a mini-stick tournament, Nerf basketball, glow-in-the dark Bingo and remote control racing cars."

Loots also does mobile home parties. You choose one of two buses to come to your house. One is a disco with a DJ bus driver and the other offers video games and tournaments run by a party host. The cost of the bus party, is the same as that of Club Loots and also lasts an hour and a half, although the cost can be prorated. For more information, check out the Loots website, www.loots.com.

"The buses brought us into the entertainment business. I like the mobile marketing concept. It's the ultimate in serving customers," Leese says. "It would be great for a home bar mitzvah. Each bus can accommodate up to 30 kids. It's soften used for corporate functions. Loots is a company that thinks out of the box.

Veterans of the Moscow Circus and Cirque de Soleil now operate The Wonderful World of Circus.

We're trendsetters.

And the Loots Club parties are a breeze for parents, he says. "It's an all-inclusive professionally managed, innovative, clean environment. This is the easiest party for parents. I tell parents to grab a coffee and watch the show."

For those who love shows, a circus party may be just the thing for their youngster's birthday. Tatiana Zoubrilina, along with other family members, has established a circus school and camp – The Wonderful World of Circus – in the Thornhill/Markham area. Her popular programs attract children from the area who take courses in gymnastics, aerial gymnastics like trapeze work, trampoline, juggling, clowning and tightrope walking.

Zoubrilina and her husband, Oleg Kantemirov, both worked at the Moscow Circus for 15 years before immigrating to Canada. He performed with the Cirque du Soleil in Montreal for five years before moving to the Toronto area to start a circus school. The school is a family affair, with their son Arthur, 22, and Zoubrilina's younger sister Laricca teaching at the school as well.

They also have a well-known clown teacher from the Cirque du Soleil, she says.

Zoubrilina notes that the circus is very much a part of city life in Russia. "Many cities and large towns have circuses. The Moscow Circus has a new show every six months."

A native of Siberia, Zoubrilina recalls going to the circus at the age of four. "I decided right there and then to go into the circus. I took gymnastics and I went to circus college in Moscow."

She says a circus birthday party can encompass different interactive options such as trampoline, tightrope and low trapeze. The children are taught these skills by supervisors – there are usually four or five – on hand for the party. Other features available include clowns, birds, magicians and dogs that do tricks.

The minimum number of children for a party is 10, but the 9,000-square-foot premises can accommodate as many as 50 children. Prices begin at $15 per child for 10. For more children, the cost is $10 per child up to 20 and $8 per child if there are more than 20 children.

People interested in the birthday party or the circus school can visit the Wonderful World of Circus website at www.wonderfulworldofcircus.com.

Look your best on your special day

Like a garden oasis amid the noise and bustle of the city, S.T. Spa welcomes its clients to a pampering, relaxing retreat. The spa, which caters to women only, is beautifully decorated, with soft green walls, fresh plants and orchid accents. The main wall is covered with words sure to set the tone of the visit: tranquility, calming, peaceful, wellness, rejuvenating, soothing, serene.

Makeup artist Estee Levine runs the spa. She believes in the importance of ongoing care and beauty treatments.

"Like when you paint a house, you've got to prime the walls and get everything ready." So too, skin that is neglected will not look its best, even when the most expensive makeup is applied, she says.

She stresses the need for proper cleansing and moisturizing with such quality products as Darphin, or Guinot of Paris.

Owned by Hershy Weinberg, S.T. Spa (416-789-9385) offers facials, pedicures, manicures, waxing and lessons in makeup application. Various massage techniques are also available including Swedish and holistic, and aromatherapy. They have even given massages to pregnant customers.

"We will be offering dermabrasion facials [a peel], as well as laser hair removal," Levine says.

It's in makeup application for formal functions, or to merely learn how to better maximize one's daily makeup routine that Levine really shines.

"My specialty is makeup. I've been doing makeup for 24 years. That's my love."

Taking different courses, including two offered by Mac cosmetics, and learning from different fashion makeup artists, Levine has developed her own style over the years. "I do work very natural."

She even finds time to volunteer at the Look Good Feel Better program at Sunnybrook Hospital once a month, helping women coping with cancer to feel good about themselves.

The spa also accepts Zareinu dollars.

For esthetic and hair care services under one roof, Matthew's Hair Salon (416-398-5228) is a top quality salon that blends up-to-the-minute style with the latest breakthroughs in skincare.

"We do almost every service here for the hair and skin," says owner Matthew Odisho.

With products by such top names as L'Oreal, Yonka and the much-coveted OPI line for nails, the salon can virtually give customers the head to toe treatment. Odisho has been working as a hairdresser for 23 years. Since opening his salon almost five years ago, he has more than doubled his clientele.

"We specialize in difficult hair, curly or frizzy hair," he notes. "We could make any curly hair straight without using a flat iron. I keep everything clean and simple."

With a background in art, Odisho is always looking at the latest styles, taking in competitions at the Toronto Convention Centre. "I'm not stuck in time, not afraid to try something new."

Up-do's for the bride or any formal occasion are approached with much consideration. Odisho asks the client about the type of dress to be worn for the function and it's colour.

"Communication solves a lot of problems to get something right for the client. To look simpler is better. I always try to keep the bride who she is. You want to look at that picture 10 years from now and you want to still love that picture."

Matthew's Hair Salon uses Kerastase hair products exclusively and applies extensions from Great Lengths. Open 7 days a week, gift certificates are also available.

Custom made kippahs can be fun for you

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Finding a creative kippah for your simchah is not always easy.

Brad Etlin (647-227-4800, 1-866-KIPPAH-4-U, www.finderskippahs.ca) discovered this when he was shopping for Judaica and felt that most of the kippot available were "kind of boring."

So a year ago, Etlin created Finders Kippahs, a business that makes custom kippot for any event.

"I produce cost effective, top quality, creative kippahs while providing customers with fantastic service and choice in the products they buy," Etlin says.

> 'It's an excellent way for Jewish organizations to fundraise'

Finders Kippahs makes kippot with a variety of different themes, including holidays, Judaica, flags, animals, English names, Hebrew names, initials and sports.

"It's the kippah that someone's going to wear again," says Aliza Katz, Etlin's fiancé and business assistant.

Customers can also send in their own designs for Etlin to embroider on a kippah of their choice.

Etlin creates these colourful custom designs on kippot made from suede, leather, satin and moire, which is a type of taffeta.

Finders Kippahs will soon be going to bar and bat mitzvahs, where Etlin and two or three assistants will make kippot on the spot. Kids will be able to choose a colour, select a type of kippah and write down their Hebrew name, English name or initials. At the end of the party, they get to take home a "gorgeous embroidered kippah that they will actually use over and over.

"It's an excellent keepsake," says Etlin. "Most people take something away from the bar mizvah and it's great for that night, but then they never see it again. Who's going to throw away a kippah with their Hebrew name on it? It's something they're going to keep for the rest of their lives."

With his portable embroidery machine, each kippah takes Etlin three to five minutes to make. The more intricate the design, the longer it takes him.

Etlin also makes kippot for babies. These tiny kippot tie under the infant's chin and are perfect for fidgety babies.

For girls, Etlin embroiders special designs on kippot, dance socks and hats. The designs include rhinestone initials, ladybugs, flowers, butterflies and hearts.

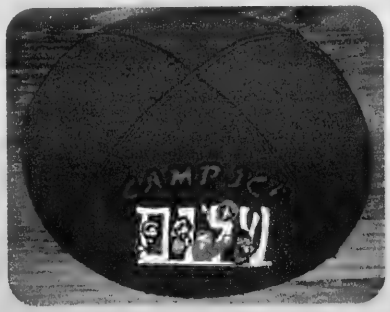
Customers can buy kippot in bulk for their function. Etlin imprints the date of the party and the guest of honour's name inside the kippah. He can also coordinate the kippah with the theme of the party.

Etlin donates a portion of his proceeds to tzedakah, helping people make aliyah to Israel.

"We feel it's important to give back to the community wherever possible," he says, adding that he loves contributing to the Jewish community.

Finders Kippahs also works with Hebrew day schools, synagogues and Jewish camps, embroidering their logo on kippot.

"It's an excellent way for Jewish organizations to fundraise," says Etlin.



Katz says the Jewish holiday theme pack is a great gift for bar mitzvahs and birthdays. This set contains kippot decorated for Chanukah, Passover, Purim, Rosh Hashanah, Shavuot and Sukkot.

According to Etlin, the kippot are also educational and help children learn about Judaism.

He says the response to his kippot has been great. "A lot of people are quite impressed," he says. "It's so exciting, nurturing and evolving my concept into products and services my clients love."

Finders Kippahs has been providing custom kippot to clients across Canada and in the United States.

Clearly many people have found that these creative kippot are a great find.

Party Guide website helps you make decisions

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Ten years ago, band leader Rick Levine (905-881-6400) wanted to do something unique to promote the Rick Levine Band. He started his party shows for this purpose, working with established bridal consultant Lynn Cohen. Then he began to develop the shows as an enterprise in their own right, under the aegis of Tyme to Party.

He founded the Toronto Party Guide website in 1999 – www.torontopartyguide.com – and he and Cohen still work together. While she is the co-ordinator and planner, Levine looks after marketing and promotion.

Lynn Cohen and Rick Levine, Toronto Party Guide Show partners.

As far as Levine knows, he is the first to create a website for weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs together, a site people will find useful in planning any other kind of event as well.

The site complements the services offered by planners and consultants whose advice and organizational skills are irreplaceable, working on the premise that you want your special event to be unique, one of a kind, and this uniqueness requires the personal touch.

Still, if it's your party, you have to do some of the work, and planning can be confusing and stressful. Where do you start? And how do you choose among the huge number of companies and professionals offering their services?

One of the things Levine's site does, is keep you informed and up to date. You not only find a wealth of names and addresses for individuals and companies providing every kind of party service from flowers and invitations to caterers and bands, you can hear audio clips and watch videos.

The information is reliable, compiled by party professionals who know your needs and offer helpful tips on organizing your event.

The site, which is regularly updated to stay as current as possible, is useful for every kind of event, traditional or modern, family or corporate, large or small, with or without a theme, in any season of the year. Moreover, you can order many items online.

You can spend as much time visiting the site as you want, when you want, 24 hours a day, seven days a week. There's no stress or pressure. And there's no charge.

The site is tied in with the live party shows Levine organizes twice each year. These shows draw people in the party industry, as well as those who are planning simchahs of their own. There is no admission, and the public is welcome.

"The only thing you pay for," Levine says, "is the gas to get there."

The most recent event was at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, and it was very well attended. This is the first time Levine has done a show in May. The next is planned for Tuesday, Oct. 9, at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

"Beth Tzedec is an excellent location, which I've used before," he says.

Usually, though, he changes the venue for each show, to give party hosts and professionals a chance to experience different places. Also, if space at the venue permits, Levine uses these events to showcase bands, DJs and singers.

These shows support the website: the vendors pay for their booth at the show, and their fees cover the cost of the site. You can send information by e-mail to info@torontopartyguide.com. The site is hosted and designed by Infinity Web Services (www.infinityws.com).

And Levine hasn't forgotten where he started out. The Rick Levine Band is still active, and he has just launched a new band, Good Vibrations.

PARTY PLANNER

Finding a mate is serious business

By ALEXANDRA J. WALL
The Jewish news weekly of Northern California

So you're over 35, single and want to find a husband – quick. Many a Jewish woman finds herself in this predicament. So like a superhero, author Rachel Greenwald is coming to their rescue.

The Harvard Business School graduate, who has marketed everything from jewelry to bottled water, is using what she learned to help her fellow women snag a man. Among her more salient tips: Always wear a push-up bra – after 35, it can't hurt.

That kind of advice may prompt some to ask, "For this she went to Harvard?" But Greenwald knows of what she speaks. The Denver consultant wrote Find a Husband After 35, which offers what she calls "a simple 15-step program."

Simple, sure. But also exhausting, no doubt.

"In any goal, if you dedicate yourself to something 100 per cent, before a lot of other things in your life, your chances are much greater," said Greenwald, speaking from her home in Denver. "If you're unemployed and you really want a job, at some point you have to decide your job search will be your No. 1 priority. The good news is, it's short term, 12 to 18 months."

Greenwald believes that if a woman fully dedicates herself to what she calls "The Program," it's only a matter of time before she'll be prancing down the aisle in a white poofy dress.

"I'm really passionate about what I do, and I can't tell you how rewarding it is to have women say to you that they've found someone they never thought existed. That's the best thing I can think of to do with my life."

Interestingly enough, Greenwald never found herself in that predicament. She knew she wanted a husband and a family – she's 39 now and has three kids – and not long after graduating with a B.A. in psychology from Wellesley College, she began hunting for Mr. Right.

"I was precocious," said Greenwald, who grew up in a Conservative Jewish family. "I looked ahead and thought how much more difficult it was to find someone after 35, and decided I was going to start a very organized plan in advance."

Attending an all-women's college taught her she had to be proactive in meeting men.

"Instinctively, I developed a lot of these tactics in my 20s," she said, the same tactics she details – and gives marketing terminology to – in her book.

Once Greenwald found herself happily married – to a Jewish man, she noted – she began coaching her single friends informally. Five years ago, she was advising a single 41-year-old friend who hadn't found the right guy. Greenwald had an epiphany.

"I realized I was telling her classic business approaches to her dating life," said Greenwald. "As we talked about improving her appearance, we were talking about packaging. As we talked about systematically calling everyone she knew to ask them if they could fix her up, we were talking about telemarketing. The whole thing took shape during my process of helping her, and I guess it really jelled at some point that this analogy in the business and dating world was so powerful."

Hence "The Program," which teaches women how to take business strategies and apply them to finding a mate.

Actually, there's nothing revolutionary in Greenwald's program. But as she said, it's how a woman sets about to meet someone that makes the difference.

For example, many people recommend women take an adult education class. But Greenwald advises rather than take one that genuinely interests you, take one you know is bound to have men in it.

Another of her strategies is asking others to set you up with people they know. Again, many people do that. But in the step she refers to as niche marketing, Greenwald suggests taking six women out on "dates" to do so.

They shouldn't be six close friends. They should be women chosen specifically for their wide range of friends, and it's better if they are from differing social circles. For Jewish women, that can mean a rabbi, or someone she went to summer camp with years ago.

"This is not just a casual thing on the phone, asking your friend if she knows anyone," said Greenwald.

"You must do your homework. You must come armed with knowledge about this woman. If she's in a book group, for example, ask her to ask her book group members if they know anyone. If her husband plays golf, ask her about his golf buddies. If she has an adult son in college, ask her to ask her son if he has any friends with divorced dads."

Being this specific may "help her trigger some resources," rather than just asking, 'Do you know anyone?'" said Greenwald, who further suggests sending a follow-up thank you note, and even a gift if a friend does indeed set you up.

Greenwald is a big advocate of online dating, and she gives advice on how to go about doing it, for those singles who haven't yet tried. This opens a whole potential pool of men, but be careful, she says. If you're doing things right, you're corresponding with several men at one time, always keeping several balls in the air. You will need to keep a journal to keep all of them straight.

In the short time she's been doing this, Greenwald has lectured widely on this topic. And among Jewish groups, she frequently hears from Jewish women who have trouble meeting Jewish men.

"One of the biggest things Jewish women can do is to increase the distribution channels by which they meet Jewish men," she said. If a woman is attending a singles group, and is using JDate, the online Jewish dating service, that's only two things, she said.

Men do prefer women with longer hair, Greenwald said. That's the truth, and she didn't create it. And a woman is more likely to catch a man's eye if she's wearing a flattering colour and something feminine. Not a power suit.

"For some women, they are not going to change a thing, and they will still find a wonderful husband," said Greenwald. "But this program is about increasing your odds. If doing something fairly easy like that can increase your odds, then why not do it?"

If you're searching for the perfect gift for a teacher, a new parent, a new homeowner or the person that has everything, look no farther than Baskets and Stuff (416-250-9116).

The Toronto store that makes gift baskets stuffed with edible goodies for every occasion also tries to use as many Israeli products as possible, and the cookies, candies, chocolates, nuts, coffees and teas are all from Israel.

What customers find most convenient is that they can tell Nili Dzaldov what they want in the gift baskets, and she puts it all together.

"It's a no-brainer. You need a gift and we discuss it, and you don't need to run around. We do it for you," says Dzaldov. "Especially if you don't know the person well, if you send a basket with goodies, anyone can eat it."

Baby baskets, one of Baskets and Stuff's staples, usually include a sturdy riding toy, an outfit, a receiving blanket, towels, baby booties, stuffed toys, a brush and comb and goodies for the new parents. They can also hand-paint furniture, like a rocking chair, stepstool or toy chest, and fill it with baby toys.

Dzaldov also puts together gift baskets for out-of-town guests that can be left in the guest's hotel room. She has also stuffed beach bags and purses, which she says make great items to carry around after the edibles have been eaten.

Sometimes, the basket itself is edible too. Chocolate baskets or houses with candies inside are popular house-warming gifts, says Dzaldov. "Some people put them on a plate and display them," she says.

Baskets and Stuff can also prepare peanut-free baskets, with dried fruit instead of chocolate, nuts and cookies. All dried fruit is prepared in-house.

When it comes to more substantial desserts, Sweet York Desserts (416-783-4293) can provide mouth-watering feasts to end any meal, ranging from wedding cakes to flambé and crepes to chocolate fountains filled with fruit.

The dessert menu that Sweet York develops depends on the meal, says caterer Sharon Firestone.

"Some people have an elaborate wedding cake and that becomes their focal point. Then we serve a plate of beautiful fruit," she says.

On the other hand, a lighter dessert, such as coffee and biscotti, can be paired with an extensive sweet table, she suggests.

Other things to take into consideration when planning desserts is the number of courses served in the meal, the timing of the meal and the personal preferences of the bar mitzvah family or wedding couple. But one of the things to be aware of when planning a dessert menu or sweet table is the quantity of food. After a heavy meal, guests may not be able to eat any more.

> 'It's a no-brainer. You need a gift and we discuss it, and you don't need to run around. We do it for you'

More dessert options might be available depending on the season of your simchah. Fresh fruits are a traditional summer dessert, when peaches, cherries and berries are in season.

"We tend to do something lighter in the summer," says Firestone. "Fruit is always a popular dessert, and fruit ice is always popular after any meal."

However, Firestone says that there is nothing really standard when it comes to desserts. Sweet York will try out new recipes and styles to accommodate nearly any dessert desire. "We treat everybody's party as an individual entity. We can work with all themes and budgets."

Although Sweet York doesn't have a storefront, it has cakes and desserts available individually through their catering office at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. A minimum of 48 hours notice is required for individual made-to-order cakes.

No stress, no fuss: Hire a planner

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Planning a party is a big job. Lots of little details have to be remembered, phone calls returned, and everything has to run on schedule. Hiring a professional party planner can relieve a lot of worry and help keep a simchah exactly the way it should be – happy.

Party planner Judy Stein (905-764-2728) has 27 years of experience in this field. Her hours logged work to the client's advantage, she says. "I have the experience, and I work with many different professionals in the city. I've done the shopping for my clients already as far as the legwork. Through my experience I can lead them in the right direction."

She keeps up on the latest fashions, constantly looking through catalogues, magazines and the Internet to get different ideas and spare clients the effort.

Stein can cater to the client's needs in many areas. Recently, she put together an affair for a 9 West store opening. She co-ordinated the catering, the décor and the music.

During the actual event, she does her job flawlessly while blending in with the other guests.

She's currently working on a wedding for a family that is using her services now for the second generation. Stein was the bridal consultant at the mother's wedding, later she co-ordinated the daughter's bat mitzvah and now she is working on arranging the daughter's wedding.

Ricky Bessner on top stair and Fern Cohen

"It's really nice to grow with the family and stay in touch with them," Stein says.

Sometimes, though, an event might not span generations as much as it does miles. Event co-planners Ricky Bessner and Fern Cohen (905-731-2005) had to plan just such a wedding. The groom's family was French and the wedding was to take place outside of Toronto. Their skills went into full swing as they whipped up an award-winning wedding, complete with local wines, pumped in power, arranged for a tent and even had a wedding cake transported in a refrigerated truck. With the artful blending of different customs and a little help from Bessner's francophone abilities, "we managed to pull it off," Bessner says.

"We specialize in making parties wonderful, in making our clients [feel like] guests at their events," she notes. "We love to see people smile and laugh."

Adds Cohen: "When they walk into their party, it's just worry free."

Members of the Canadian Special Events Society, the two were recently nominated for best wedding of the year.

When they meet with a client, they try to personalize the event. They listen to the client and try to identify what their objective is for the party. They also stress the importance of the clients' meshing with their chosen party professionals. In this way their experience working with various professionals over the years can be very helpful to the client.

"We resource all the time – new and exciting people. We're always in the know," notes Bessner.

Planner Risa Gold (905-882-4343) knows the importance of co-operation among party professionals to maximize the event.

"We have to work together with all the professionals and help them, if possible, to do their job properly."

Party entertainment should have mass appeal

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

There are many pieces to the party puzzle, but if there is a central one, it is the entertainment.

That's why the entertainment you hire must have mass appeal, say Nicholas Page of Party Impressions and entertainer Debi Sander Walker.

Nicholas Page

"You want to make sure that the (entertainment) appeals to all your friends and everyone at the party," says Page.

"That's why I visit the client before the party for a free consultation to go through what they like, [what their] budget is and we'll have something tailored to the party."

Party Impressions offers a mélange of trendy activities and mementoes for party guests.

Professional artists enrich the party experience by offering guests such things as custom designed vintage T-shirts, air brushed body art and stylish graffiti adorned hats.

Page says clients like it when guests leave the party with something tangible.

"We want to give something they're going to wear and use beyond the party," he says, adding that the clothing he provides is typically seasonal, such as toques for the winter and perhaps a custom made laundry bag for kids heading off to overnight summer camp.

A fashion buff, Page travels to England and New York every year to take the pulse of the latest trends, which he then incorporates into Party Impressions' product list.

"We change with the times," he says.

For corporate affairs, Page says everything from massage therapy to shoe shining has become trendy.

One trend that never seems to die is having a live performer put on a show.

Singer, song writer, actor and event planner Debi Sander Walker of the namesake company offers a zany and hilarious array of character sketches to crack guests up.

For instance, the high pitched, whacky red-headed "Carmellina" garners "shock value" every time she plants a big kiss on a bald and beautiful guest.

"It blows the audience away," Sander Walker says. Sander Walker encourages party hosts to seek out an entertainer that is versatile, so that they can cater to the sense of fun of a wide range of guests.

"The diversity is what we offer," says Sander Walker, who recently released a CD entitled Full Spectrum.

The comedic entertainer, who can incorporate her own band or a client's band of choice with her performances, has also delivered pre-wedding singing telegrams as a tension breaker for soon to be brides and grooms.

"It gets the person to relax and be appreciative of their partner to be," she says.

Both Sander Walker and Page encourage clients to meet with either the performer or the person planning the entertainment to make sure they get precisely what they're paying for.

Decor: The Professional Touch

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Tammy Heisel of Artistic Creations (905-770-9335, www.tammyswebsite.ca) and Joseph and Brigitte Bouganim of Decorevents (905-709-4979) are professionals in party decor. If you ask them how to choose the right decor people for your party, they emphasize different factors, but they both set high standards for themselves and urge you to work with professionals who do likewise.

Joseph and Brigitte are a husband and wife team. Brigitte is the idea person who can design anything from a centrepiece to a backdrop. "Decor isn't a business for me," she says, "but a passion."

A decorative floral arrangement by Decorevents

Joseph says he can build anything "from a centrepiece to a house."

He sets out to teach his clients to enjoy their parties. "It's a once-in-a-lifetime event," he points out. "You'll have only one chance to get the most out of it." And to enjoy the party, you have to relax and let the professionals take over.

There are a multitude of choices in decor, he explains, and party professionals will help sort them out.

The Bouganims put a high priority on building long-term customer relations, and they get plenty of referrals. They have good people working with them, and Brigitte is not afraid of comparison with competitors. "Look around," she says confidently, "and come back."

If you're choosing a decor house for the first time, Heisel and the Bouganims advise you to look for two things: quality items and materials in the showroom and quality service.

Heisel also stresses the importance of experience, rapport with the customer, organizational skills and the ability to network with other party professionals such as florists.

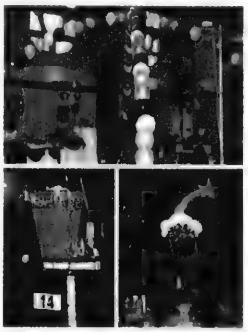
If you want the name of a good decor house, Heisel suggests you talk to people you trust who have put on events similar to yours.

"Ninety per cent of my business is from referrals," she says, "though I get calls from ads too."

You will want quality decor and accessories, Joseph says, but you'll also want to work with people who are right for you and your individual needs. Not only should they be familiar with lighting, backdrops, chupahs, linens, centrepieces, and whatever else you need, they should be able to assist with organizing. And for this, you have to spend a bit more.

`A good decor house will deal with quick changes and have someone on hand to help with emergencies. Even so, Heisel recommends booking early: anywhere from a couple of months to 2½ years, depending on the event.

"A bar mitzvah boy," she elaborates, "might change his theme from hockey to basketball. And it's one less thing for you to worry about, if you already have decor people booked."



Decor by Artistic Creations

Heisel goes on to stress the importance of keeping within your budget and choosing decor people who respect it. And, while you have the final say, choose people who will be honest enough to tell you when something won't work.

Heisel observes that many of her customers enjoy the artistic satisfaction of creating their own decor. She's glad to work with them, assisting them with her talents in areas such as creating mockups of designs.

Decorevents offers a wide range of floral and themed centrepieces and also specializes in henna parties. Before a big event such as a wedding or bar/bat mitzvah where, as Joseph puts it, "you invite everyone including people you don't know," it's a Sephardi custom to throw a smaller, more intimate party called a henna. This can be a separate event or incorporated in the main simchah – usually after the main course, before the sweet table.

Heisel has a background in art and has done cartoons and animation. Her experience also includes graphics and package design, and she does her designing by hand. She will fulfil all your artistic needs, from room design to centrepieces and place cards; and rather than have you come to a store or showroom, she will visit you personally at home.

A meaningful Shabbat spent in a trailer park

By NICOLE NATHAN
Special to The CJN

Friday afternoon, erev Shabbat. I'm in the midst of the usual preparations; the table is set, the chicken soup is steaming and the challah is finally in the oven.

The only difference is, we are in a trailer park in Urbanna, Va. We have driven here from Toronto, convoy-style, with another family, and we are about to spend our first Shabbat in a camper.

I hear some banging outside my door and glancing out, I see our two men folk, fiddling with fishing wire, measuring tape and a hammer. Despite the fact that Chesapeake Bay is renowned for its catch of trout, I know this fishing wire will never make contact with a float or a hook. In fact, it will never be cast across the waves; it is part of our makeshift eruv.

Having surveyed the topography of our two campsites, the eruvites start by planting a few wooden posts. The plan is straightforward; they will simply hammer small hooks into the posts and wind the fishing wire through the hooks until it encircles us. With this in place, we can carry food to our outdoor dining room and elegant Shabbat table with its white plastic cutlery and matching cups. And, our families' nine kids can enjoy playing with their toys on our lovely grass patch. As for the adults, we intend to spend a meaningful Shabbat, books in hand, flopped in our beach chairs.

The eruv team, however, is having slight difficulties. Husband 'A' has somehow managed to tangle himself in the wire and is squirming and flapping about like a freshly caught halibut. Husband 'B' has hammered himself. He too is jumping up and down, although he is busy mumbling incoherently with his thumb plugged in his mouth.

I ignore these squealing, thumping sounds. I must turn my full attention to baking. Before long, the wonderful, enticing aroma of freshly baked challah envelops the RV and wafts out the door. It ambles along to the playground, gently nudging our children, reminding them of Shabbat's arrival. Excitedly, they run home, shower and jump into their RV best: shorts, polo shirts and baseball caps for the boys; sundresses for the girls. We are hundreds of miles from the nearest gefilte fish and do not want to draw attention to ourselves. However, given the dress code of this trailer park, our kids still look overdressed.

> 'The wonderful, enticing aroma of freshly baked challah envelops the RV'

"Attention fellow RVers. The eruv is officially up. Anyone who approaches it, touches it or breathes on it will suffer dire consequences…"

Our eruvites sternly deliver this public announcement, proudly dust off, drop their tools and promptly dive into the beach chairs. Upon questioning this behaviour, the female contingent is told that the eruv designers and installers have taken upon themselves a very important responsibility; namely, they must guard the eruv from infiltration. This apparently requires great concentration and an ability to sit still and stare for long periods of time.

The sun dips behind the trees, glimmering through the branches. Long shadows are cast across our dozing sentinels. With just a few minutes before sunset, I go through my Shabbat list: unscrew the fridge and freezer lights, check; turn on bathroom light, check; fill up and plug in the urn, check.

I kindle my white Shabbat candles and the flickering light envelops us in a calm, warm caress. We sing songs to welcome the Shabbat and the children start to dance in circles, giddy from the joy they palpably feel every Friday night. We may be miles from home, but the feeling here is equally magical; just as the flames rise up and away from the wax, we feel uplifted and enriched – freed from that fast-paced, tense world of our everyday affairs.

We sit down to a delicious Shabbat dinner and our songs echo beneath the black starry sky. One by one, we drop off to sleep. For four harried adults traveling with nine over excitable kids in two tiny RVs, Shabbat is a much-needed pit stop for refueling and tuning up.

In fact, I like to take this refueling concept very seriously. Come Saturday morning, I challenge myself by trying to wake up a little later. The problem is, some pesky bug is busy brushing my eyelid, trying to peel it open. I rouse myself to swat at it but catch my daughter's chubby hand. This is her irritating yet highly effective way of ordering juice – and my wake-up call for a hot coffee.

Guess I was pretty exhausted when I fell into my sleeping bag last night; I am still wearing last night's clothes. My skirt is so creased, it looks like a candy wrapper that was stuffed into a child's pocket and then went through the wash. I grab my coffee mug, whip on my baseball cap and make a beeline for the magic urn outside.

Spending Shabbat in a trailer park in Virginia

The urn is steaming on this fresh spring morning and I can already picture myself in one of those beach chairs, sipping my coffee and contemplating life. I place my mug under the urn and press the lever. It spits back at me in disgust. One tiny droplet crawls into the cup. Bewildered, I tilt the urn, knock it, plead with it. Remember when Moses tried to get water out of a rock? He hit it with a long staff and water gushed out. Did we pack a staff? I now look like a mad woman scrambling for a fix.

> 'I don't think the neighbours will help you make a minyan'

Since I hate suffering alone, I wake my husband with the bad news. He is incredulous. We return to the forlorn place, empty mugs in hand. We soon realize that in my haste late Friday afternoon, I turned the temperature on the urn to the highest setting, transforming our coveted coffees into condensation.

"Would you like some milk and sugar with your water droplet?" he asks me.

I scowl at him and curl up in my beach chair empty handed. A moment later, the door to the other RV is thrown open wide and out comes our friend draped in his tallit, siddur in hand. "Oyyyyy, Shabbat," he yells at the top of his voice.

"Shhh!" I hiss back at him. "I don't think our new neighbours will help you make a minyan." I point to the adjacent campsite.

A gleaming RV has pulled up next door. The driver is polishing his fancy trailer, while his wife is setting out the patio furniture and arranging their landscape ornaments. They have a miniature windmill ruffling in the breeze, a few coy looking gnomes and a fancy birdfeeder that looks like Notre Dame Cathedral. She places a basket of azaleas on the flowery tablecloth, then hangs up a sign: 'Betty Sue and Chuck's humble home.' Their Golden Retriever dozes outside his very own red-shingled dog house.

"I bet that dog's pillow is more comfortable than mine," my husband comments, then pulls the tallit over his head.

I throw a nervous look at our wax buffing, gnome loving neighbours with their perfectly groomed Golden Retriever. They fit in so well here with their cute welcome sign and droopy-eyed gnomes. As for us.... I shoot a furtive look at my husband, his tallit flapping in the wind.

"What if Betty Sue and Chuck ask us about our fishing wire?" I ask.

The tallit brigade is completely unfazed by my question. "It's very simple," my friend explains, his voice booming. He pats my husband on the shoulder. "You see, he is my patient and I am his physician. This man is completely and utterly insane. Originally he spent most of his waking hours sequestered in closets. Only through intensive therapy have we been able to get him to this point. Now he only requires to be enclosed by a thin string in order to function normally."

> Many miles from home, yet the feeling is equally magical

My husband plays along and starts to twitch nervously. Suddenly our kids run out, surging forward like the stampede scene in The Lion King. Within seconds, I hear a 'snap.'

"Eruv's down. No more carrying," I yell out. Our kids promptly drop their toys and the procession moves on. It's only 7:20 a.m. and our site is already a hodgepodge of sand toys, monster trucks and bedraggled dolls – not to mention the dangling fishing wire. And with the eruv broken, we can't pick anything up.

The new challenge is how to prepare lunch with ingredients that are in two RVs – without carrying anything outside. We have the mayonnaise and our friends have the cold cuts; we have the challah and they have the cutting board. This promises to be a very interesting day.

As I go inside to do a food inventory and menu redesign, I notice our neighbour's gnome is missing. On closer inspection, the windmill and doghouse are also gone. Before I know it, the fancy RV disappears down the road in a cloud of dust. I imagine they went searching for greener, cleaner and saner pastures. I guess we stick out like my poor husband's sore thumb.

Oyyyy Shabbat. Those short-lived neighbours have no idea what they are missing.

Invitations inform and excite

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

When a simchah is brewing and the word must be spread, party planners use invitations to inform and excite their guests.

"Invitations are the first contact you have with a party," says Veronica Waisbein of Visual Dreams (905-761-8675).

They are also the link that unites family and friends from across the globe in preparing them for upcoming events, she says.

"Invitations bring people together," Waisbein explains. "At my son's bar mitzvah, people came from all over, and it was the invitations that were in charge of that."

Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus (905-881-5588) says invitations are tremendously important, as "they are the first glimpse of an affair."

Invitations by Visual Dreams (above) and Stationery Plus (top right)

She says hosts get the most "mileage" from their invitations because while a party only lasts a few hours, invitations are regularly seen by guests for weeks or months in advance.

At Stationery Plus, invitations can be ordered for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, office parties, and luncheons, says Lefton.

She says invitations do not have to be high end in order to impress, but notes there are certain stylish trends clients may choose to follow.

Overlays, where a layer of paper lies on top of the actual invitation, have become quite popular, Lefton says.

"It's like a little present, lifting up the top layer to expose the writing."

Bows, pressed petals and waxed seals are common touches, says Lefton, and shimmery, glittery or satiny finishes have maintained their appeal.

"Some things should never go out," she says.

Waisbein considers herself and her team to be invitation artists and designers, and says she offers her clients "dreams worked on a card."

Visual Dreams prides itself on its custom-made creations, where no two cards ever look alike. Each set of invitations flaunts a unique style and flare.

"Everything is original," says Waisbein. "We try not to make any look popular."

But there are certain consistencies that Waisbein upholds when choosing the layout of her projects.

'Wedding invitations tend to be conservative'

Wedding invitations tend to be conservative and elegant, with a beige, white or green colour scheme. Bar and bat mitzvah invitations, on the other hand, are usually more flashy, with bright and vibrant detail, she says.

"With bar or bat mitzvah invitations, we have the liberty to create more. Here we can fly."

Waisbein says she also makes invitations for corporate events, blending the logo of the company or organization into the card.

Waisbein says when deciding what will go into each work of art she need only "look at the eyes of people." Through personal consultations with her clients, she is "able to get a feeling of what they are about."

In a series of visits to a client's home, Waisbein says she develops ideas with the input of the client.

"It's usually the mother that makes most of the decisions," she says.

Waisbein says she knows people operate on hectic schedules, so the convenience of a home service saves clients both time and travel hassle.

The invitation creation process at Stationery Plus also involves client input, says Lefton.

"We listen to the client, try to determine what they're saying and then develop ideas," she says.

Some clients go for custom designs, while others like to customize an invitation from a book, she says. Copying a sample directly is doable as well.

"Sometimes people just love what they see," says Lefton.

Lefton says she is diplomatic when it comes to the decision making, but always honest when sharing her opinions.

She says that orders should be placed about six to eight months before an event, although a year ahead of time never hurts.

"This really leaves the field open for the client," says Lefton. "But when they order their invitations depends on their comfort level."

At Visual Dreams, a period of about two months is required for invitation meetings, sample showings and labour on the final product, says Waisbein.

While the company does not have an official motto, it goes by a "no rules" policy.

"The sky is the limit," says Waisbein. "We don't go by the books."

There is no set price for invitations by Visual Dreams; it all depends on the demands of the client, she says.

The layers of paper needed for each creation, as well as the amount of work, the quality of materials and the types of ideas involved all contribute to the cost.

Lefton says there is a broad range in what she charges her clients. While invitation packages at Stationery Plus can start at $300.00, Lefton has sold work valued at $18,000.

Her invitation packages can contain any or all of the following items: envelopes (lined or unlined), response cards, thank-you notes, valet or parking voucher cards, out-of-town guest information cards, seating cards, wedding programs, menus and kippahs (personalized or not).

Because her business has operated almost 25 years, Lefton says it is not unusual for a family to rely on her invitation expertise for every major milestone "as the page turns."

With feedback such as "The invitations look great! We are all thrilled!" Lefton is equally as greatful for her clients as they are for her.

Coming up Roses in Jerusalem

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Israel Press Service

When your TV screen shows placard-waving Israelis exercising their democratic right to protest, chances are they're doing so from Jerusalem's Wohl Rose Park.

The park's 19 landscaped acres between the Knesset and the Supreme Court have hosted hundreds of thousands of social and political demonstrators over the past 30 years, as well as the more usual park populations of strollers, joggers, ballplayers, tourists, children and rose-lovers.

"With the park so intensively used, much of our budget goes to clean-up and maintenance," says its director, landscape architect and law school graduate Lior Bar-On. "We never expected any prizes!"

The 37 national rose societies of the World Federation of Rose Societies, however, thought differently. Last summer, at their world convention in Glasgow, Scotland, they bestowed on the Jerusalem park – which was created by the Jerusalem Foundation in 1981 with a donation from Vivienne and Maurice Wohl – their prestigious Award of Garden Excellence.

"There are many wonderful rose gardens around the world, but some are truly exceptional from a historical, educational and/or visual point of view," said the federation judges.

"The Wohl Rose Park of Jerusalem is an expansive municipal public park devoted to roses and maintained to the highest standards."

Judged not only for the number of rose varieties grown and special rose varieties developed, but also for its appearance and upkeep, its accessibility to the public, the number of visitors, its website and its involvement in the life of the city, the Wohl Rose Park scored high in all categories.

"It's good to see Israel in the news for something unrelated to politics or terror," says Bar-On. "In fact," he continues, "the Wohl Rose Park has more to say about the real Israel than any number of slanted newscasts."

The area was first designated parkland in 1949 and for a decade was used solely for official government ceremonies until public pressure forced it open to everyone. Developed, supported and maintained by the Jerusalem Foundation and the City of Jerusalem, it is Israel's largest rose park and has won a central place in the life of the city.

Colorama, a highly scented red hybrid tea rose with star-shaped petals that are creamy yellow on the reverse – one of the 400 rose varieties in Jerusalem's Wohl Rose Park.

Its success owes much to careful planning, with open, embracing hills and valleys. Spurning formal flowerbeds, the park's 15,000 rose bushes are displayed naturally in great asymmetric swathes of colour.

A Garden of the Nations – comprising sections donated by cities and countries worldwide – occupies the park's upper level, each section displaying roses and other features that typify the contributing country. Switzerland's contribution, for example, is a garden for the blind, with highly scented roses and Braille signs, based on a rose park in Rapperswil.

At the heart of the Wohl Park is a split-level pond filled with aquatic plants and ornamental fish.

A garden of fragrant deep yellow Freedom roses in Jerusalem's Wohl Rose Park.

A waterfall tumbles from natural exposed rock above the pond, once used as a quarry. Along the park's north-eastern side is a wooden pergola, covered with scented yellow roses. In its north-west, wild rose species grow, and on its eastern border is an experimental section, where new rose varieties from all over the world are tested for their suitability to Israel's climate.

"We have some 400 different rose varieties spread across the park's lawns, hills and valleys," says park curator Dalit Kaslassi.

"Some are original rose species from which the flower was first bred 300 years ago; others are old garden roses, the products of early breeding; and others still are modern roses, such as hybrid tea roses, floribunda, polyanthus, miniature roses, rose shrubs and modern climbers."

As well as preserving and developing different types of rose, a park goal is demonstrating the variety that rose gardening offers, she explains. "You can have blossoming cloaks of color or roses climbing up pergolas and pillars; there are 'sculpted' rose shrubs, rambling roses and standards roses, as well as roses with decorative fruit."

If life in Israel is not always a bed of roses these days, in the Wohl Rose Park in Jerusalem at least, with an international award in hand and myriad plans underway for the future, prospects are looking rosy.

Specialists in children's clothing

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Precious children deserve to be dressed in only the best, especially so for a special occasion. Carmen's Designs for Children (416-656-9856), specializes in custom-made fashions in superb designs, from infants to teens.

Owner and designer Carmen Romao is a natural designer. She remembers as a young girl sitting while her grandmother sewed and designing clothes for her dolls. She now designs exclusively for "living dolls", in the most original and delicate of fashions.

Peruse through her boutique and the eye rests on one-of-a-kind dresses in exquisite materials of peau de soie, dupioni silk or organza. An original design often featured for the junior attendants incorporates silk flower petals that appear to float in the skirt of the dress. They stand out against a neutral background and can be matched accordingly with the wedding colour theme.

A tulip dress, with a scalloped hem that mimics tulip petals, is fashioned in tulle with sequins. Ribbons, bows, beads and cord are all elegant accents, artfully placed to enhance a look. As Romao gestures at the clothes around her, she states, "we are more of a special occasion kind of store. It's very important to me that the client is completely satisfied. Most of these are just one-of-a-kind."

Prom dresses too can be made up to size 20. Teenage girls are often at that "in between" stage notes Romao, "they can't always find something in the adult store, or in the children's store, so we make it to measure." That's the advantage of custom design.

With two locations, the boutique offers one-stop shopping for custom-made clothes, accessories, even shoes - ballet slippers with pearl trim are made to match the outfits. Suits or tuxedoes can also be made to match dresses in the wedding party. The same material or colours used in the dresses can be picked up on with a matching vest or tie.

Crawford Boys (416-782-8137) is a store specializing in boyswear. A family run business since 1952, and originally a menswear store, the shift to boyswear exclusively came in 1989.

A sportcoat and pants from Perry Ellis, one of many formal clothes available for boys at Crawford Boys.

"We specialize. Boys' clothing is all that we do so I carry a bigger inventory, far more variety than other stores," says owner Paul Spiars. "I can take chances buying more colours and styles. Because we specialize, I devote almost one third of my floor space to husky sizes."

The advantage is greater selection, availability and top notch service for boys ages 4-16 years. The store is laid out like a young men's store, with a full complement of accessories like belts and ties. Such names as Guy Laroche, Point Zero, Hilfiger and Perry Ellis are represented in the merchandise.

Their ties are made from the same materials used in men's lines, so they're always current silks.

"We have them cut to our specifications for the younger boys. We've been told that we've probably got the best selection of boys' ties anywhere," notes Spiars. To complete the look, they carry at least 30 different shades of dress shirts and smashing suits, sure to do justice to the most proud bar mitzvah boy.

Spiars believes in involving the boys in the decision-making process when choosing a suit or outfit.

His staff talks to them at their level, not down to them. At the back of the store is a pinball machine and basketball net, for shooting a few hoops. The front of the store boasts a showcase with a nice collection of hockey memorabilia. This further illustrates Spiars philosophy, that the store be "fun, it isn't a stiff clothing store."

"We have people calling us from Halifax, Calgary, Winnipeg, Vancouver. They can't find what they want back home, and we've been able to help them over the phone."

But Spiars has no intention of opening another store, he explains "With one store, I can keep track of everything that's going on, who's coming in and what they want. The store's run more effectively, more friendly. This is a service business, I don't think there are many stores that can compare to us when it comes to going the distance."

Other kids' fashion places advertising in this supplement are: Zero 20, 416-532-4459; Beatties, 416-481-4459.

Historic island synagogue perfect wedding venue

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Engaged couples very often want to create an atmosphere for their union that is meaningful, memorable and uniquely their own. Some brides and grooms who want their event to be wild and unconventional have exchanged their vows in hot-air balloons, on roller coasters or even while bungee jumping. As if the thrill of actually getting married is not enough.

Destinations

More and more, men and women today are choosing to get hitched on foreign ground and combine their wedding, honeymoon and vacation for guests all in one. One couple had their wedding nuptials in Prague's Altneu Synagogue, where they were surrounded only by immediate family members. Another couple invited friends and family to join them in Cuba for an out-of-the-ordinary union on a beach. Everyone took a vacation at the same time.

One exotic place for a wedding that combines the atmosphere of the above two examples is a historic and architectural gem: the Hebrew Congregation of St. Thomas. The synagogue sits in the middle of the Caribbean, but is still part of the United States.

Although the congregation was founded in 1796 with a membership of about nine families, the present synagogue dates from 1833, when a new building was erected for its 64-family membership after a city-wide fire destroyed the sanctuary.

The current rabbi is Arthur Starr, who hails from New Hampshire. There are 105 member families, which includes residents of St. Thomas and the surrounding islands.

Thirteen children are in religious school and about 55 to 60 people regularly attend Friday night services. The synagogue building is the oldest in continuous use under the American flag and performs 15 to 18 bar mitzvahs a year for mainland families.

The Congregation of St. Thomas – known as the Congregation of Blessing and Peace and Loving Deeds – is steeped in history. The architecture of the building is Spanish since the original community in St. Thomas was Sephardi Orthodox (today the synagogue is Reform). The original European candelabras, which used to be lit with oil, have been electrified, except for two in front of the Ark that are used, with candles, only on Kol Nidre night. Three of the Torah scrolls are more than 200 years old and the smallest one, from Czechoslovakia and written in 1771, was recovered following World War II.

The Hebrew Congregation of St. Thomas.

The glistening mahogany chair of Elijah, used for brit milah ceremonies, stands in the corner. It used to be carried from house to house when needed. The menorah is of Spanish origin and dates back to the 11th century. The four pillars that support the structure were handmade in Denmark especially for the synagogue and symbolize the four matriarchs of Judaism: Sarah, Rachel, Rebecca and Leah. The thick hurricane-proof walls protect everything in the building.

An unusual feature in the synagogue is the sand covering the tiled floor. One legend is that it is symbolic of the desert through which Moses and the Jewish people travelled for 40 years. Another more significant story is that it is in remembrance of Converso Jews (more commonly known as Crypto or Marrano) who were forced to convert to Catholicism during the Spanish Inquisition in 1492, but who continued to practise their religion in private. They would congregate secretly in their basements and cover their basement floors with sand to muffle their singing and prayers.

Given that the congregation was originally Sephardi, "this is the more likely story and in commemoration this floor has always been covered with sand," Rabbi Starr says.

To learn more about The Hebrew Congregation of St. Thomas, visit their website at www.onepaper.com/synagogue.

Cookies and bars you can make ahead for your party

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The old adage, if it ain't broke, don't fix it, certainly applies to the series of baking books created by best-selling author Esther Brody. It's apparent that her publisher is not about to tamper with a formula that sells.

The Calgary grandmother has sold more than 100,000 books since 1998 when her first book in the series, The 250 Best Muffin Recipes, was published by Robert Rose.

Another 250 Best Muffin Recipes was issued in 1999, followed by The 250 Best Cookie Recipes and The 250 Best Brownies, Bars and Squares in 2000 and 2001 respectively.

Brody's latest offering, The 250 Best Cakes and Pies, has been out since last September on the heels of a new edition of the muffin book, encompassing all 500 of recipes. Brody recently completed a sixth manuscript on cupcakes, custards and cobblers, and she insists that this is the final book in the series.

After doing six books in six years, Brody says she wants to relax a bit and spend more time with her five-year-old granddaughter, Natalie Arielle Pinchas, to whom most of the books are dedicated.

Brody says she's not giving up writing. She wants to do a book on rhubarb, crab apples and other garden recipes, but at a slower pace, she says. "I don't want to have to work with a deadline. The book will get done when it gets done."

Brody was always a good cook and excellent baker. "I take after my mother," she says, "I loved to watch my mother bake and cook." But she says she never planned to make a career of it. Her foray into the food business and book publishing was a serendipitous journey that began with a batch of her home-made muffins some 20 years ago.

At the time, Brody, a single mother of two young children, supported the family by doing freelance legal secretarial work. A colleague had tasted her muffins and asked if she could make some for a law society meeting because "the benchers were sick and tired of doughnuts."

This meeting led to further requests for muffins and Brody soon found herself supplying stores and filling private orders. "I would be up baking in the wee hours. I'd deliver the muffins fresh the next morning."

She says she welcomed the business. "I worked at three or four different jobs. When you're a single parent and you have to support two young children, you think of everything possible."

The muffins soon became a full-time business, and in Calgary, Brody came to be known as the Muffin Lady. However, she could not keep up with the demand, especially when the Seven-Eleven convenience store chain approached her. "I would have had to supply all their stores."

So Brody stopped baking muffins commercially and decided to share her recipes so that other people could make them. Inspired by The Best of Bridge cookbook series, she set out to create a muffin bible.

Six years and 600 pages later, she completed All My Muffins, a hand-written book, that Brody self-published in 1994.

"I didn't know a thing about publishing," she recalls. "I hired a photographer to taker pictures of the muffins in my house."

Brody was also her own marketer and distributor, going from town to town in Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Manitoba, selling the books from her car.

"I had a 1985 Mercury Grand Marquis with a huge trunk. The car was loaded up to the ceiling with books. I'd come back with an empty car and go home and fill up.

"I never imagined I could travel like that, stopping in small towns. I met really interesting people. Every store bought a book."

She had a print run of 3,000, selling most of the books for $39.95 a copy.

Impressed by this success, Brody's son encouraged her to write more books, she says.

He sought out a publisher and eventually connected Brody to the Toronto-based cookbook publisher Robert Rose. As luck would have it, the company was in the market for a muffin book.

For Brody, her odyssey as a cookbook author has been "very exciting. I never dreamed that I would be writing a book."

All her books include traditional recipes for Jewish holidays and festivals.

The following recipes are sweet treats that would be ideal for any party.

Tasty treats for entertaining guests at home

1 cup oil
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup chocolate chips

Sugar Cinnamon Mix
½ cup granulated sugar
2 tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a cookie sheet. In a bowl, mix together flour, salt, baking powder and cinnamon. In another bowl beat eggs, sugar and oil until blended. Mix in vanilla. Add dry ingredients and mix well. Fold in chocolate chips.

On a floured surface, divide dough into 3 portions. Shape into 3 rolls about 2 to 3 inches wide. Place at least 2 to 3 inches apart on prepared cookie sheet. Bake in preheated oven for 30 to 35 minutes until lightly browned and a toothpick inserted into the centre of one of the rolls comes out clean and dry.

In a small bowl combine sugar and cinnamon.

On a cutting board, cut hot rolls into slices about ½ in. thick. Dip each slice into sugar-cinnamon mix until well coated. Place on cookie sheet and leaving oven off, return to oven to dry for 20-25 minutes. Makes about 4 dozen.

CREAM CHEESE CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

1 package (10 oz.) mini-chocolate chips, divided
2¼ cups all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking soda
½ cup softened butter
1 package (8 oz) softened cream cheese
1½ cups granulated sugar
1 egg
½ cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Use an ungreased cookie sheet. In a saucepan over low heat, melt 1 cup chocolate chips. In a bowl, mix together flour and baking soda.

In another bowl, beat butter, cream cheese and sugar until smooth and creamy. Beat in egg until well incorporated. Beat in melted chocolate until well combined. Add flour mixture and mix well. Fold in nuts and remaining chocolate chips.

Drop by tablespoons about 2 inches apart, onto cookie sheet. Bake in preheated oven for 10 to 12 minutes or until cookies are firm around the edges. Immediately transfer to wire rack to cool. Makes about 4 dozen.

CHOCOLATE CHIP MERINGUE BARS

From The 250 Best Brownies, Bars & Squares by Esther Brody

2 cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. baking soda
½ cup butter or margarine, softened
½ cup granulated sugar
1½ cups packed brown sugar, divided
2 eggs, separated
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tbsp. water
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips or pieces

Preheat oven to 325 and lightly grease a 13x9-in. cake pan. In a bowl, mix together flour and baking soda.

In another bowl, beat butter, granulated sugar and ½ cup of the brown sugar until smooth and creamy. Beat in egg yolks until incorporated. Stir in vanilla and water. Blend in flour mixture. Spread mixture evenly in prepared pan. Sprinkle chocolate chips evenly on top, pressing lightly into dough.

In a clean bowl, beat egg white until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in remaining brown sugar until stiff peaks form. Spread evenly over dough. Bake in preheated oven 30 minutes or until meringue is golden brown. Place pan on a rack to cool completely, then cut into squares.

Eglinton Theatre transformed into Eglinton Grand

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

One of Toronto's historical landmarks, the Eglinton Theatre, has undergone a $3.5 million transformation and has re-opened its doors as The Eglinton Grand, a special-event venue.

The Eglinton Grand

Designed by Kaplan and Sprachman, the Eglinton Theatre, at Eglinton Avenue and Avenue Road, won the 1937 Royal Architectural Institute of Canada Bronze Medal for its advanced and beautiful art deco furnishings. It was once the flagship for the Famous Players national cinema chain.

By 2001 Famous Players decided to close the theatre following an Ontario Human Rights Commission ruling to make the theatre accessible to the disabled.

A group of local residents formed Save the Eglinton Theatre and collected nearly 10,000 signatures on a petition and another 1,700 online. Last August, Dynamic Hospitality & Entertainment Group acquired a 20-year lease on the building and renovations began.

The Save the Eglinton Theatre group has been 100 per cent behind The Eglinton Grand (416-485-5900, www.eglintongrand.com) as the theatre has been recreated, not destroyed, says Sandra Brega, general manager of Atlantis Pavilions, which is part of the Dynamic Group. "A number of historical elements in the building have been maintained and restored."

The Eglinton Grand's 1930s art-deco splendour was recreated by Elite Construction Inc. and architects Munge/Leung Design Associates.

The Grand's construction alone involved 96 tradespeople, including painters, carpenters, plumbers and electricians, who worked for 30,000 hours. The amount of electrical wiring used inside The Grand is equal to 218 football fields or 36 CN Towers standing on top of one another.

The Three Muses

Two original statues from the theatre, The Sirens, which stood on each side of the movie screen, have been restored and now anchor the front of The Grand's main space. An original hand-made mural made out of etched glass, The Three Muses, had to be recreated as it was too badly damaged to undergo restoration.

The marquee has been returned to its former glory and the refurbished ticket booth will be used by valet car jockeys.

The main floor of the Eglinton Grand accommodates 350 diners with a dance floor and 400 without one. Cocktail style, the main floor has room for 550. The capacity of the mezzanine without a dance floor is 130, accommodating 275 cocktail style. Cocktail-style, the lobby has space for 175.

The Grand is fully accessible, with washrooms, ramps and lifts.

If you rent The Eglinton Grand for a function, the venue is exclusively yours, Brega says. Services and options at The Grand include on-site ceremonies, a bridal room and audio visuals, including a 16-by-20-foot retractable screen at the front of the main space.

"There's a customized sound system installed in the room that provides surround sound in the entire space," she says, adding that The Grand "has wonderful acoustics because it was built as a theatre."

Preferred kosher caterers for The Eglinton Grand include GMB Culinary Productions, Rhonda Litwack Fine Food and Zuchter Berk Catering & Event Design. Room rental includes set up and tear down of tables and chairs, white floor-length tablecloths, napkins, glassware and the services of a kitchen supervisor and a function manager.

The Eglinton Theatre opened its doors in 1936, attracting people from all over Toronto who lined up for hours to get a glimpse of Toronto's newest movie theatre and to see King of Burlesque starring Jack Oakie. Many of Hollywood's biggest stars could be seen on the Eglinton's screen at one time or another.

The theatre remained competitive until the late 1990s when it began to lose its edge because of competition from movie houses that gave patrons multiple-viewing options under one roof.

'Great Dress' bears an interesting history

For more than 500 years, the keswa el kbira bridal ensemble has been fondly referred to as the "Great Dress" of the Moroccan Jewish community. The style rose out of clothing worn by Spanish Jewish women in the 15th century and variations of the keswa el kbira were brought to Morocco by Sephardim fleeing Spain and Portugal in the late 15th century.

Keswa el kbira* is fondly referred to as the 'Great Dress'.

The keswa el kbira has a number of regional variations and was made of different colours and styles in different regions of Morocco. Velvet was the most commonly used fabric.

The "Great Dress" consists of five separate pieces. The jeltita is a wrap-around skirt with a heavily embroidered front corner. The gonbaiz consists of a jacket or a bodice with shirt sleeves. The neckline is a deeply scooped keyhole shape and there are heavy bands of embroidery on the neck and sleeves. The puntaktel is worn with the gonbaiz and is a close-fitting plastron or breastplate made of heavily embroidered material. The kmam is a scarf or a pair of sleeves, which is worn draped across the bride's shoulders. The hezam completes the costume. It's a sash or woven belt wrapped around the waist.

Gold embroidery is applied to all the pieces of the dress. This mode of dress was especially popular in the 19th century. The keswa el kbira was usually worn by brides from the Spanish speaking urban communities of Northern Morocco. The families living in big centres were able to afford it more than those living in the outskirts.

Many of the Jewish women exhibited great artistic skill and they were paid for doing the embroidery on these dresses.

A Memorable Wedding in the Holy Land

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

A ruined Scottish castle, New York's Central Park and the Spice Islands of Zanzibar are now among choice locations for weddings with a difference.

Or notching up the experience yet further, bride and groom can arrive at their Fijian beachside ceremony by war canoe, or depart their Sri Lankan nuptials on elephant back.

For those in search of a more Jewish experience, however, including kosher food on the table, Jerusalem is a highly popular destination. And if it's Jerusalem, as often as not it's that most venerable of Jerusalem institutions, the King David Hotel.

"Every major city has its special hotel, and in Jerusalem it's the King David," says Charley Blacher, executive assistant manager of food and beverages.

"Some 85 to 90 per cent of our wedding clients generally come from abroad."

Guests, he says, are attracted not only by the King David's name, facilities and service, but also by its stunning Old City views. "We're well aware of this and hold all wedding ceremonies, receptions and dinners in halls and terraces that frame the Old City."

Clients from abroad will generally fly in to plan the wedding, and then return later for the actual event, often with a planeload of relatives and friends who stay at the hotel.

"Everyone has their dream of how their wedding – or their daughter's wedding – will be," says Blacher. "We listen carefully, and then try to guide them, especially if what they want sounds unrealistic. What's important, we emphasize to them, is that the event is memorable in the best sense."

Guests are usually very thankful – sometimes embarrassingly so. "None of us here will forget one bride who came to thank the staff when the evening ended," says Blacher. "We're used to being thanked, but this lady insisted on embracing each one of us – chefs, waiters and managers. We all felt pretty awkward!"

The hotel's wedding packages run from about $65 per head to $165, including flowers and wine. An upper-end-of-the-scale event could include a chupah on one of the hotel's outdoor terraces overlooking the Old City, a reception around the pool in the King David's famed gardens, with cocktails and canapés, and a four-course sit-down dinner followed by a dessert buffet.

Champagne would be offered on entering the hall and dinner would be comprised of goose liver hors d'oeuvres, a soup, salmon en croute, followed by fillet Rossini with side dishes.

Viennese desserts would be laid out buffet-style – cakes, tarts and strudels, warm chocolate pie, local baklava and fresh strawberries, washed down with sweet Turkish coffee and tea with fresh mint.

"I believe our catering is on a level with the best hotels anywhere," says Blacher. "And as far as gourmet kosher catering is concerned, we're probably better than anywhere else."

What happens to all this food when a wedding is called off? "That has happened," says Blacher. "The bride, groom and many of their guests had come in from the United States. The food had been prepared – the wines brought in, meat cut, and so on – though fortunately not cooked. And then the day before, the bride got cold feet and cancelled everything. She was unable to reach many of the guests, and so it fell to us, standing at the entrance to what should have been the wedding reception, to tell people as they arrived that the wedding was off."

The food was used in the hotel, he says, the wines went into the cellar and the extra staff was cancelled, but there was nowhere to put all the flowers that had been ordered. "The bride's family asked us to have them taken to a local hospital," he recalls.

The most nerve-wracking wedding that Blacher has organized at the hotel was for the daughter of one of the King David's owners. "They had the chupah and reception on Mount Scopus and the dinner in the hotel," he says.

"We catered everything – which meant we had to be the first to arrive at each event and the last to leave. We worked out a minute-by-minute schedule, kept in touch with one another by walkie-talkie, and pulled it off without a hitch (and with an enormous sigh of relief!)."

While the wedding is the main event for the client, to the King David staff it's often no more than part of a day's work.

"At breakfast next day, the bride and groom will see one of us, and want to talk about it all," says Blacher. "By then, we're probably neck-deep in organizing the next simchah. Or perhaps a foreign dignitary or two is staying in the hotel while the wedding takes place. Security and press converge for the dignitary. He's holding a private function in the hotel. Meanwhile, the wedding guests are pouring in. Our job is to make sure that one doesn't affect the other."

"Officially I'm an assistant Food and Beverage manager," he says. "But more often than not I feel like a juggler, keeping a lot of fast-moving balls safely in the air."

Mandell continues to be fresh and exciting

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

In the area of interactive entertainment, one company surpasses all others as the greatest innovator and trendsetter, the granddaddy of them all – Mandell Entertainment (416-923-7200).

Moving into its 17th season, this is one group not satisfied to rest on its laurels. Company president Jarred Florence explains, "we always like to come up with new and different ways of entertaining everybody. We're really and truly building our business on becoming unique from week to week; we have to because kids these days are going to more parties than ever. You want them to walk into a party and feel that they're seeing something they've never seen before."

Company president Jarred Florence

Inevitably one of their party experiences proves to be fresh and exciting.

Over the last year their own band has become very popular: The Mandell T-Dot Band. It fills in the gap between having a D.J. playing recorded music and a band playing live music. "It's funky, it's sleek and yet it's finished.

"Everything flows perfectly," adds Florence. "I can say without having an ego that I think that my staff are the best."

"We're very good at being competitive and staying within certain budgets. We can produce and create any type of event that people would want, if they're willing to go that far with us. We don't just play a CD and wait for everything to happen, we're always in the crowd with the people we're entertaining."

Current popular party giveaways are yoga headbands. The girls pick the colour, style, and a patch from a choice of thousands for a customized headband. The same can be done with wristbands or a trucker hat. Camp paraphernalia such as rugs or laundry bags can be personalized by a professional graffiti artist.

Summer camps throughout the province are well acquainted with Mandell Entertainment. With their annual camp summer tour, each major camp gets a visit monthly by the top entertainment crew, including D.J.'s, all the lights, production and the support of their sponsor, Roots. With inflatables and prizes in tow, the camp enjoys a full day of fun, Mandell-style. Notes Florence, "we're getting geared up for the 2004 camp summer tour. We want to make sure that we make it different from last summer with something that's never been done before at any camp."

For a very fun and original idea instead of traditional place cards, Mandell Entertainment recently used personalized bobble heads at a function. The guests were asked in advance to send in a picture of themselves, and later the photos were placed into bobble heads and placed around the dinner tables.

Ever involved in the community that's so embraced them, Mandell Entertainment has provided the venue for many charitable organizations, including The Association for Soldiers in Israel, Mount Sinai Hospital and the Starlight Children's Foundation. This year as they have for the last several years, they set the tone for The United Jewish Appeal Walk with Israel. They produced the pre-walk activities, and co-ordinated everything from the main stage ceremony to the D.J.'s all along the actual walk. A Mandell Ultimate Home Party was even the grand prize for whomever raised the most funds for the walk.

With event themes from casinos to clubs, Mandell Entertainment can do it all. Their dancers, D.J.'s, laser and lights, pyrotechnics, video shows, and party rentals are limitless, they can even create the feel of a pool party indoors, with lights rippling across the dance floor to simulate the look of a pool.

You can see what they offer by visiting www.mandellworld.com

Corey Mandell with his brother Jeff, CEO and COO of Mandell Entertainment respectively, have together opened Lobby in downtown Toronto.

Florence refers to it as "the hottest place to come to dinner, all the celebrities that come to town go to Lobby."

So what's the best way to ensure you and your guests can enjoy yourselves to the fullest at your next function? Book Mandell Entertainment and party on!

Donating your leftovers makes a great mitzvah

By DONNA GORDON BLANKINSHIP
Special to The CJN

Sometimes the smallest details are the ones that make the biggest impression. You remember the pretty napkins or the mints with dessert. You remember the bride walking down the aisle with both her parents instead of just her father. You remember the way the bat mitzvah girl wore a hand-made yarmulkah.

Chances are you don't remember the decoration colour scheme or what was served as a main course for dinner. But if a mitzvah project is part of the celebration, it will be one of the details noticed and appreciated, no matter how small the effort.

After Debra Nielbulski returned from a family gathering in St. Louis, she remembered the unusual centrepieces on the tables at a family brunch. The beautifully decorated baskets of food served a dual purpose: as centrepieces and as a mitzvah project.

Nielbulski brought the idea back to her home in Seattle. She put together a committee and created the fundraising project that has supported the Jewish Family Service Food Bank for many years.

The project has grown geographically over the years, with similar efforts in other cities in North America. Some families continue to put together the baskets on their own and donate the food to a food bank of their choice.

On a related theme, depending on the time of year, baskets of school supplies or socks and other necessities would be appropriate for bar mitzvah decorations. How pretty the mitzvah is remains up to the family, so decorating the social hall with baskets instead of flowers doesn't mean you have to sacrifice your colour scheme.

You can even pay a private basket company to do the donation centrepieces together in an attractive way. Be sure to hang a pretty tag from the basket explaining where the food or other items will be donated.

Tables are the place to look for another celebration mitzvah project. One detail to think about while you are planning your simchah is what to do with extra food after the event. A number of organizations are interested in sharing your leftovers with others.

For more information, look in the yellow pages for food banks and homeless shelters and find out if they take donations of party leftovers or if they know of an organization that does.

In some cases, you may have to drive the trays over to your local homeless shelter, but think of all the hungry people who will share your simchah. And don't let anyone try to convince you that donations like this are illegal. You cannot be held liable for the food you donate, as long as it didn't sit on someone's plate first.

A national Jewish organization called Mazon: A Jewish Response To Hunger offers another simple way to help the hungry while you are celebrating a joyous family occasion.

Mazon encourages families to donate a percentage of the cost of their simchah to help feed the hungry. Mazon funds projects that deliver meals to the homebound, provide food to kosher kitchens, offer nutritional counselling for low-income women with children and advocate for long-term solutions to hunger.

"Mazon is, of course responsive to hunger among Jews, but in keeping with the best of our traditions, it also responds to all who are in need," a Mazon pamphlet says.

The organization was founded in 1985 to "build a bridge between Jews who enjoy the blessings of abundance, and the millions of children and adults who are hungry or who live at the very edge of hunger each day."

Visit www.mazoncanada.ca for more details.

For brides who have no real plans to wear their beautiful wedding gowns again, a mitzvah project in Israel might appeal to you. The Rabbanit Bracha Kapach gives used wedding dresses to brides who cannot afford their own, in addition to a wide variety of other relief projects she conducts in Jerusalem. Danny Siegel in his book Mitzvahs suggests sending your wedding dress to the rabbanit in the hands of a friend who is visiting Israel. The rabbanit also needs wedding rings. You can contact her at 12 Lod St., Jerusalem, 249-296.

This is only a small sample of the many possible mitzvah projects a family might undertake to celebrate a wedding or bat mitzvah. For additional ideas, ask your rabbi or read Siegel's book Mitzvahs.

Historic archives recorded arranged marriages

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Today's Jewish singles have more means than ever to meet prospective mates. The list includes traditional matchmaking organizations, Jewish online dating services, Internet chat rooms, e-mail, synagogue and community social programs, singles clubs, and connections through relatives, friends or colleagues at school or work.

Years ago, Jews lacked the freedom to travel and network that people in modern society take for granted. Nevertheless, our astute ancestors figured out neat ways for their progeny to meet and marry. While many North American singles may not appreciate the idea of an arranged marriage, it's interesting to see how the system worked in Ashkenazi and Sephardi communities of the past.

> According to tradition, Abraham was the first parent to use a matchmaker

Back then, shadchanim, Jewish matchmakers, were hired to arrange appropriate matches. Ideally, they were supposed to check references, consider compatibility and personality traits, and see if the families would get along. After the introduction, the shadchan would check to see if things went well.

According to Jewish tradition, Abraham was the first parent to use a matchmaker, charging his servant Eliezer to seek a wife for his son Isaac. Even today, in some haredi circles, the couple barely meets before marriage and has virtually no say in the match.

> An unmarried girl of 21was considered a spinster

In a charming book called From My Grandmother's Kitchen, American author Viviane Alchech Miner discusses her rich Sephardi heritage. A descendant of the Benaroya and Alchech families, Miner's ancestors left Spain in 1425 and sailed to countries that were then part of the Ottoman Empire. At the beginning of the 20th century, a branch of the family settled in Switzerland, where Miner spent the first nine years of her life. She immigrated to the United States in 1954. Miner's family tree has a long line of rabbinical and talmudic commentators and kabbalists that stretches back to the 1600s.

Miner says marriages in her family were arranged for centuries in order to maintain social and religious traditions and family ties.

"The parents of a prospective couple would sit down together at a table laden with sweet jams, cakes, wine and Turkish coffee," she says. "Each family reported the various household goods, money or property that would be given to the newlyweds. If this dowry satisfied the parties, the wedding took place within three months."

Girls married at 16 and boys at 18, but once in a while, a young girl married a man who was 20 years her senior. This only occurred if the girl was breathtakingly beautiful or the man was wealthy. A girl who reached the age of 21 without marrying was considered a spinster.

Today, North American wedding ceremonies and receptions take place on a specific date. Sometimes, other festivities are also reserved for close relatives and friends. Before the turn of the century, Jewish communities in eastern Europe invited everyone to participate in week-long Sheva Brachot festivities. This included blessings after meals for six consecutive days, excluding Shabbat, after the wedding.

Jewish registers in eastern Europe at the turn of the century indicate that multiple marriages took place within days of each other. Since the ceremonies usually took place in the bride's town, the marriage records enable historians to trace the ancestors of those getting married. The groom's town of registration and that of his father-in-law are also usually listed in the marriage register.

Sometimes neither the bride nor the groom were from the town where the marriage took place. Given that most weddings were multiple, it is most likely that the family of one of the people getting married had relatives living in that town who were getting married at the same time.

Planning for an out-of-town event

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

One day, my husband and I got invited to a wedding in Chicago. But when I told him about the invitation, he quickly replied, "How nice, but we're not going."

My response was an emphatic "Why not?"

Without taking a breath, he said: "It's too far. I have to work over the weekend. I can't take a day off. We don't really know the bride and groom. It'll cost too much. Pick any one of the above."

But I argued that since we had never been to Chicago, this would be a great opportunity to visit the city and have a mini-vacation to boot. And so we went.

Having gone to a multitude of weddings, bar mitzvahs and special events out of town, I speak from experience when I say a great deal of preparation is required for the trip.

And yes, it is definitely more costly. Besides the expense of a gift, there is transportation and accommodations, not to mention meals, and of course, shopping. How can you be away from home and not go shopping? Also, if your event is in the United States, there is the exchange rate to consider.

If you're travelling by car, you will want to arrange your schedule so you get to your destination with enough time to participate in all the festivities planned for the out-of-town guests. Some other issues to consider may include asking for time off from work. If air travel is required, there is the question of ground transportation. Will you need to rent a car once you are at your destination? And of course, most important, where will you be staying?

Very often, party planners make arrangements at a local hotel for their out-of-town guests. They will frequently get a reduced rate for a block of rooms, and it is usually a good idea to stay there since it is more than likely one of the planned events will be held in the hotel.

Destinations

On the other hand, sometimes relatives or friends can put you up for a long weekend and this will cut your costs considerably. If this is what you decide to do, remember: you are in someone's home, not a hotel. Pick up your wet towels and soiled clothing and leave the bathroom neat and tidy. Do not expect to be waited on, and if you help yourself to a snack, clean up your mess. Most importantly, do not forget to bring your hosts a gift and thank them for their hospitality.

> 'Never think you will get what you need when you arrive at your destination'

Once the travel and accommodation issues are settled, it is time to deal with packing your luggage. What will you need for a three- or four-day weekend of celebrations? It is a good idea to make a list of the types of clothing and accessories you will need, including toiletries, cosmetics, medications, sleepwear and jeans or sweats for lounging or shopping.

If your closet holds several party outfits that are appropriate for the time of year, that's great. If not, you may need to supplement your wardrobe. Women can buy a fresh sweater or blouse to compliment last year's pant suit, or they may want a whole new outfit. Men may also want to buy a new tuxedo shirt or a cummerbund and matching bowtie. This is another added expense, but one you can always justify by knowing that these items will be in your closet for future parties.

It is sometimes practical to have mix- and-match pieces so that you can reduce the amount of luggage but still show up at the different events in a new ensemble. Both men and women can use this method: several shirts/blouses, sweaters, jackets or vests with one or two pairs of trousers/slacks or skirts will give you several outfits and different looks.

Another thing to consider is footwear. You will need a dressy pair for formal wear, sneakers or comfortable shoes for walking or exercising and possibly a third pair of casual shoes for any other outfits you may have.

Toiletries should be packed in plastic containers when possible and stored in plastic bags before placing them in your suitcase to avoid possible leakage onto your packed clothing. Medications should be carried with you if you are flying as should any special jewellery you may want to take with you.

One last important point is: never think you will get what you need when you arrive at your destination. You rarely have enough time and you will not always find the store you need. So make sure you have your camera and enough film, sufficient panty hose in the right colours and your nails and hair done at home.

Now, go and have a good time.

Workbook helps couples cope with money management

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Financial understanding and planning contributes to a successful relationship in marriage, says clinical psychologist Jonathan Rich.

Rich, a former professor at California State University who is in private practice in Irvine, Calif., has helped many couples over the years. He has also taught counselling techniques to family therapists.

Rich says marital discord often stems from money woes. To help couples with their financial difficulties, he created a softcover self-help workbook that looks at money management on every level. The Couple's Guide to Love and Money, distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, is a wise choice for couples who are contemplating marriage as well as those who have been married for years.

> Financial understanding contributes to a successful marriage

Depending on the family situation, money can represent power, control or freedom. Rich teaches readers how to negotiate with partners about finances and shared responsibilities.

The workbook format is enlightening and interactive. Readers engage in thought-provoking exercises and quizzes. The 22 chapters are organized in three sections. Part I examines relationships with partners. Part II suggests ways to improve relationships. Part III offers leads on how and where to find help. Rich adopts a positive attitude, but he is realistic and says success depends on each spouse's level of commitment. He includes an exercise that enables partners to see how they measure up. He laments that gambling, alcoholism and drug addiction can make a relationship unworkable.

At the outset, Rich asks both partners to check off their individual short-term goals. Here he deals with the psychology of money. Upbringing, culture and disposition are topics rarely discussed in theoretical financial texts. Financial gurus prefer to focus on dry figures. Rich, on the other hand, delves into these issues.

> Quarrelling over finances is commonplace among couples

Quarrelling over finances is commonplace among couples, and so the exercise on page 8 is universally applicable. Readers are invited to consider their views on the following topics: how to spend money; where it should come from; security versus taking risks; the meaning and importance of careers, family roles and trust. Does money cause problems in the marriage? How much? Partners are asked to circle one of the following phrases: no problem, small problem, some problem, big problem or huge problem.

Rich uses case histories to illustrate his points. In one instance, a woman who wants physical security insists on a new car with airbags. But her husband believes a used car is sufficient for her lifestyle. Rich offers ways to sort out these problems without fights or resentment.

Even in this age of dual-career families, gender differences do exist, Rich observes. Researchers have found men and women view money differently. Rich uses references to back up his findings. Women, he argues, are less likely to take financial risks. They are less likely to be speculators, but more likely to seek long-term investments. Women think they know less about money than men, but actually know just as much as men do and they tend to be just as good as men at investing.

One of Rich's innovative exercises aims to help partners who argue over money. The exercise asks each spouse to write a summary of what their partner did or said during their spat and how they reacted. Space is provided in the workbook, so readers need only a pen or pencil.

In Chapter 8, "Where does money come from?" the author lists three places couples can maximize income without sacrificing happiness. Work is a time-honoured solution. Love-money is acceptable, provided it's based on a loving relationship. Ulterior motives don't count. Taking a risk that can result in financial loss or great gain isn't worth the worry, especially if the risk-taker is about to retire.

Chapter 10 surveys the money circle. If a couple starts off and continues to share the same philosophy about money and how to spend it, that's fine. But that's not the norm, Rich says. Most partners handle money differently and must consider one of three choices: change the way you think – align your view with your partner's; change your partner's view – "Good luck!" Rich says; or work out a compromise, but "don't silently simmer or bicker."

Rich includes diagrams with exercises on handling finances and keeping the family financially stable. Other topics include spending and debt, depending on family money, risking security to accept career challenges, career changes, creating ideal work situations, investments, savings and insurance, financial planning for the lifestyle you want and money-saving strategies.

Celebrate your simchah in Israel

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

If you want a meaningful way to celebrate your child's bar or bat mitzvah, consider a family trip to Israel.

"There has been a huge resurgence of people taking their children to Israel to celebrate bar mitzvahs," says Stanley Morais, El Al's Canadian general manager.

Part of the renewed interest, he explains, is because people are getting used to the situation in Israel and adapting to it. At the same time, they hear from friends and family who have gone to Israel recently and returned with stories of how great it is there, says Morais, who just returned from a week in Israel, adding that the restaurants are full and there are people out on the streets all the time.

Destinations

"We are realizing that we can't not go to Israel because of what we see in the media," he says.

Morais says that he has been seeing an increase in multi-generational family trips to Israel, with grandparents taking grandchildren.

"It links and strengthens the bond between generations that a trip elsewhere in the world does not do," he says.

Other trips that have become popular are 25th or 50th anniversary trips and bar mitzvah trips that are timed to coincide with Passover. This past year, Morais says there have been hundreds of Passover trips that centred on celebrating a bar mitzvah.

"El Al has a unique ambience on its flights," says Morais. "It's the feeling of Israel before you actually arrive in Israel." The flight announcements are always done in Hebrew first, then in Hebrew-accented English.

El Al also boasts of having one of the best safety records in the aviation industry, and there have been discussions recently of outfitting El Al planes with a missile defence system that will protect passenger aircraft from missiles.

El Al is increasing the number of flights on its Toronto-Tel Aviv route to eight times a week, with double runs on Sunday, Tuesday and Friday. El Al does not fly on Shabbat and holidays.

Emile Aufgang of Aufgang Travel (416-789-7117) also knows a thing or two about Israel trips. Although his travel agency can make travel arrangements for anywhere in the world, Israel trips are his specialty.

Aufgang usually deals with two types of trips: the organized trip where travelers book into a package tour, and the customized trip, which Aufgang organizes personally.

He recently arranged a customized trip for a family of 15 to go to Israel simply to have fun. It included rafting on the Jordan River, a Bedouin dinner, camel trekking and the air force museum, as well as the more traditional tourist sites. Because Aufgang has been to Israel so many times, he knows many of the tour guides personally and selects one he thinks will mesh best with a given group.

He too has also seen an increase in multi-generational trips where the grandparents will take the whole family along. Although finding activities that will appeal to people of every age group can sometimes be a challenge, he finds that most grandparents have been very flexible about what they are willing to see. Some grandparents are willing to join the young ones on a raft in the Jordan River or sift through dirt on an archeological dig, while others are content to sit back and watch the family have fun.

"Some grandparents inevitably say, 'Make the children happy,'" he says.

Aufgang has also put together custom vacations to other corners of the globe, including a six-day group trip to Ireland.

One of the most important things to keep in mind when planning a vacation is the type of hotel you want.

"Know what level of hotel you're getting," he says. The old adage that you get what you pay for often rings true when it comes to hotel accommodations. Make sure that the level of service and quality matches up with the price you're willing to pay. Otherwise, the results can be disappointing, Aufgang cautions.

Enjoying quality time with guests

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Weddings and grand social gatherings present an opportunity to celebrate an auspicious occasion with relatives and friends. But when the guest list is large, it's difficult to devote quality time to each guest, and hosts are rarely able to get into an in-depth conversation without interruption.

As columnist Marcelle S. Fischler noted recently in the New York Times ("Field Notes," March 7, 2004), "It isn't until the waning moments of their weddings that most couples come to recognize just how little time they were able to devote to their guests."

Everyone wants to take advantage of significant festivities. But whether the wedding takes place in New York City, Montreal or Toronto, it's no secret that toasts, speeches, multi-course dinners, dancing, and posed photo/video sessions monopolize most of the evening. And sophisticated party-goers will acknowledge that, amid the din of blaring music and background banter, a wedding reception isn't the time or place for heart-to-heart chats.

Fischler suggests holding intimate gatherings to ensure meaningful contact between hosts and guests. Instead of figuring out how to chat with every guest in one full swoop, wedding hosts will find multiple opportunities to shmooze.

Most hosts are considerate and plan dinners, luncheons and brunches for family and out-of-town guests. The advantage of these intimate gatherings is the chance for serious chatting in a relaxed, quiet setting.

Here are some effective ways to spend quality time with each guest and let out-of-towners feel at home.

Shabbat dinner: Out-of-towners often arrive Friday afternoon before a Sunday evening wedding, so they will appreciate an invitation to observe Shabbat and enjoy a heimish repast with the wedding hosts. Since there is still time before the wedding, things will be relatively calm. Shabbat, a day of rest, follows, leaving time to stroll and catch up on the news.

Shabbat lunch: After services, everyone settles down to lunch and it's another quiet, informal opportunity to find out what's new. Post-Shabbat dinners are also popular, provided they end early enough to let everyone to get some rest before the big day.

Brunches after the wedding allow hosts to say goodbye to their guests and wish them a safe trip home.

Rehearsal suppers, bridal showers, and other prenuptial and post-nuptial events are also great vehicles for quality socializing.

And who knows, maybe we'll see the return of the formal reception line of yesteryear. Until the 1960s, it was customary for members of the bridal procession to form a reception line and formally greet every guest as they entered the reception hall after the ceremony.

While some may regard these lines as archaic, the formality served a useful purpose. Today, guests must scurry to track down the bridal party and wish them mazel tov. Sometimes, dinner is well under way before they have been able to hone in on a busy host's time.

Fortunately, it is customary for hospitable hosts to visit each table during dinner and greet their guests. While these short welcoming sessions fail to substitute for meaningful chats, they are a way for everyone to touch base.

Planners ensure all is perfect

She cites an incident when place cards arrived very late for a dinner, and the caterer needed help getting them set up. Gold stepped in and was able to lend an extra set of hands.

As Gold has become known by her excellent reputation, she now has brought in others to work with her. "I have other consultants that have been trained by me. Because I have associates, I'm able to offer different services, and there is always input from myself. No matter who the clients are, I do get involved in one way or another."

Some clients may be looking for help from the early planning stages of an event, others only require assistance on the day of the event.

"People are looking for someone to take care of everything for them that day," Gold says, someone to keep checking on the details, ensure the photographer's on time, the table's set properly and such. There have been a lot of requests lately for such services for a bar mitzvah.

For a wedding, an assistant always comes along with a consultant. "Basically there are two people there that day working on the job," Gold says. One may help the bride with her train, while another guides the wedding party in for the ceremony.

As a courtesy, Gold has begun offering talks at her office, with guest speakers on topics pertinent to event planning. Issues such as the stresses of planning a party, talks on marriage and makeup demonstrations have been covered in the past.

Creative chupahs are a labour of love

By DONNA GORDON BLANKINSHIP
Special to The CJN

Nancy and Kim Goldov wanted to personalize everything about their wedding. She sewed her own gown. He composed music for the ceremony. They both created a new last name to share: combining Stolov and Goldschmidt into Goldov. So it probably didn't surprise anyone that the couple spent months crafting a one-of-a-kind chupah to say their vows under.

"The rabbi used the image of weaving our lives together," when he commented about the way Nancy and Kim carefully planned their creative wedding, with the help of friends and family. Nancy says they decided to make their own chupah out of hand-dyed silk and hand-crafted wood in part because they wanted to create a lasting memory.

"The wedding became a focus for all of our creative energy," she explained. They also were able to take such a creative approach to the chupah because they had lots of time and friends who were craftspeople and willing to help with the wood-working and dying of the silk.

"It wasn't a sudden wedding. It was a very planned wedding," Nancy said. "It's not something every couple could do or want to. ... We kind of went overboard."

But now, thanks to their hard work, Nancy and Kim also have a beautiful canopy over their bed. They can look up and see the magical "tree of life" with pomegranates, apples and figs. The tree surrounds a star of David made from a piece of spalted maple wood found in a park. The four posts of the canopy are a delicate combination of several different kinds of wood.

Nancy says the chupah cost a few hundred dollars to make, but is now considered a priceless family heirloom. She is having a quilt made for their bed that mimics the design of the tree. Someday she may change the chupah in some way to signify their children.

One of the questions Nancy asked concerning her creative chupah was whether it adhered to Jewish law concerning wedding ceremonies. According to The Jewish Catalog and Rabbi Maurice Lamm's book, The Jewish Way in Love and Marriage, the chupah is affected more by tradition than law.

Traditionally, the wedding ceremony took place under the stars as an omen that the marriage should be blessed with as many children as stars in heaven. To create a more intimate space for the ceremony, rabbis in the Middle Ages allowed the use of a chupah.

Rabbi Lamm says the chupah symbolizes the groom's home into which he invites the bride. It is required only for the seven blessings and only the bride and groom need to stand under it.

"It teaches that this simple, fragile room which is now common to both partners launches the marriage," Rabbi Lamm explained.

As with any wedding ceremony decision, it is best to discuss chupah ideas with your rabbi before you start collecting materials and assembling the structure. Depending on whether the rabbi is Reform, Conservative or Orthodox, he or she may have different ideas about what is required.

> 'The chupah symbolizes the groom's home into which he invites the bride'

Some of the more common kinds of chupahs involve a tapestry or tallit hung fastened to the top of four poles. The poles can be held by four friends or put in some kind of stand. Keep in mind the length of your ceremony before making a decision about whether to have people hold the poles. Some brides prefer to decorate the tapestry with flowers.

How elaborate a chupah you choose also depends on how much time and energy you want to put into the project. A combination of creative energy and a little chutzpah helped Jenifer Thornton and her mother create a special chupah for her wedding.

"I'm in a creative field and I knew that I didn't want to just do the standard," Jenifer said. They researched whether they could rent a creative chupah but found nothing to their liking.

"We just kind of thought, if it works out, great." The only problem was — and this would be a big problem for many brides — they didn't know what the chupah was going to look like until an hour before the wedding. They couldn't put it together in advance and then move it to the location of the ceremony.

Jenifer and Philip Thornton's chupah consisted of plaster columns, adorned with lace netting, green plants, ivy and copper ribbon. "It was beautiful and everyone loved it. The only thing I would change would be the lighting," she said, indicating she would recommend backlighting the chupah for a greater impact.

She says it wasn't expensive, but warns that finding proper columns can be a challenge. Most replicas that can be rented are too light and easily toppled by sudden movement.

"It's difficult to rent them. They have to be heavy. You definitely don't want them to fall over," Jenifer said. She rented the columns from a friend who doesn't usually loan them out.

Another approach to creating your own chupah is to consult with an architect or a landscape designer. When Julie Israel got married about five years ago she was lucky enough to have an architectural designer right in the family, her mother, Linda Haugen.

The chupah for Julie's wedding to David Israel consisted of "marbleized" wooden columns and a trellis covered in ivy and flowers. The structurally dramatic chupah fit in well with the architecture at her synagogue. "It was a very dramatic and important structure and it added considerably to the whole ceremony," she said.

Fitting the chupah to the setting and the personalities of the bride and groom is very important, but perhaps the most critical aspect of the project is getting prepared to build it the night or morning before the wedding in just a few hours.

Her experience in architecture and the theatre prepared Linda for the project. "If someone wanted to have a chupah like ours, they should turn to someone with our level of experience. It would be difficult for the average person to do it. It really involves a lot of thought and coordination," she said.

When asked if such a structural chupah could have a second life after the wedding, Linda said one could consider reconstructing it in their garden. She adds, "It's your first house and that's what's so lovely about it."

Savvy celebrants exercise poise at receptions

Once a couple sets a wedding date, their social life takes on a new meaning. Instead of blending in with the crowd, they assume the spotlight at prenuptial events. By practicing party etiquette, the celebrants set a good example. Hence, everyone will feel confident and enjoy the wedding festivities.

Conventions change but good manners never go out of style. In 1922, author Emily Post's first edition of Wedding Etiquette became a bestseller. The author's great granddaughter-in-law, Peggy Post, carried on the family tradition and now readers seek advice from the fourth edition of the book.

In response to the query, what makes a perfect wedding, the late matriarch noted the bride and groom both look like there was "sunlight behind their eyes, as though their mouths irresistibly turned to smiles." To ensure those bright eyes and smiles, Peggy Post points out the importance of becoming familiar with all the social and familial obligations and traditions a family entails.

Hilda Klinkenberg of Etiquette International (www.etiquetteintl.com), a New York based firm that trains private citizens and corporate executives in the social graces, is convinced good etiquette helps people become "more poised, polished and professional."

Klinkenberg is the official etiquette consultant for the Miss Universe organization. Here is a sampling of practical party guidelines to ensure success, when thrust in the spotlight.

Adjust your attitude: Perform whatever mental gymnastics it takes to put yourself in a positive frame of mind before you get to the party.

Keep your purpose in mind: The bar or the hors d'oeuvres table should be your last port of call. Concentrate on greeting and meeting people and on getting into conversation. Remember to make eye contact while having discussion. No one wants to talk with someone who is looking elsewhere instead of listening.

Never drink on an empty stomach: Make sure to have a snack before the event. The risks of losing control or being indiscreet are too great. In addition, pace your alcoholic intake throughout the course of the function.

Don't juggle hors d'oeuvres and accoutrements: According to Etiquette International, the party-goer should hold everything in the left hand. Put the cocktail napkin between the ring and baby finger of the left hand. Then, spread the ring and middle fingers to act as a base for the plate of hors d'oeuvres. Use the thumb and index finger to hold the stem or base of the glass and to stabilize the top of the plate at the same time. With the left hand in control, the right is free to greet guests.

How to tackle toothpicks: Food served on toothpicks or cocktail sticks keeps your fingers clean, but there is the problem of what to do with the sticks. Don't litter, but don't put them back on the serving tray. It is unappetizing to others and it is unhygienic. If you cannot find a container, put them in an ashtray, on a dish or on the tray when the waiters are collecting empty glasses. If nothing is available, wrap the toothpicks in a napkin and dispose of them later.

How to tackle toothpicks:

How to handle difficult foods: Certain foods can create problems. For example, olives with pits are held in the fingers and eaten in several bites, then the pit is discarded on the side of the plate in an ashtray or into a napkin.

Crudites are dipped into the accompanying sauce only once. Never dip something from which you have already taken a bite back into the sauce. Hold your cocktail napkin beneath the vegetable to catch any drops of sauce that may fall.

Bite carefully into cherry tomatoes or puff pastry to avoid spraying yourself and everyone within arm's length. Always exercise caution to avoid burning yourself when biting into hot hors d'oeuvres. Test the temperature unobtrusively with the tip of your tongue and remember that the inside is usually quite a bit hotter. When an hors d'oeuvre tastes unpleasant, don't spit it out. Turn your back to the crowd before transferring it from your mouth to the cocktail napkin. Find a waste paper basket to dispose of it immediately yourself.

Down-to-earth tips simplify packing for honeymoon

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Engaged couples are so preoccupied with pre-nuptial parties and wedding festivities they are apt to put off packing for their honeymoon. But last-minute packing is risky. Since newlyweds tend to be tired and in a rush, they often pack indiscriminately. Some even delay purchasing items until they arrive at their destination. Travellers will save time and money if they buy the items they need and pack them before departure.

Advance planning is a boon to honeymooners. Before leaving town, provide a family member or friend with a photocopy of your itinerary, passports and traveller's cheque receipts.

Savvy travellers know that too much baggage is a burden. Try to avoid duplication by sharing such items as a camera or toothpaste. To save space and to increase wardrobe potential, co-ordinate separates with colours and styles that mix and match.

Select comfortable and wrinkle-free clothes. Many experienced travellers enclose garments in plastic bags or use tissue paper to prevent creasing. In addition, they make sure to break in new shoes before their trip. Sometimes luggage is lost, late or misplaced in transit. Therefore, it's wise to pack essential items and a change of clothes in a carry-on case.

To simplify packing, keep this list handy. After placing an item in the suitcase, tick it off the list.

Selection depends on where you're going, the climate, your length of stay and what you're activities will be. For example, the attire a couple dons for an upscale Caribbean cruise differs from the gear they wear for a fishing trip at a desolate camp site. The apparel and equipment on the following list can be tweaked to suit each traveller's needs.

Gourmet gift ideas make delicious 'scents'

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Today's career-oriented couples have less time to prepare daily dinners than ever. But when newlyweds settle down, they are eager to try out their culinary skills. Retailers always report numerous gift requests for small food appliances, kitchen and tableware.

In addition to introducing innovative gizmos, astute manufacturers are constantly upgrading traditional appliances. Cuisinart, Hoover, KitchenAid, Krups, Lagostina, Moulinex, Oster, Philips, Proctor Silex and T-Fal are just some of the companies responding to the renaissance in gourmet cooking and entertaining in the home. The costs of these items add up, so newlyweds appreciate receiving these items as gifts.

> It pays to do a little detective work

Although you may find small appliances out-of-town or on sale, consider the fact no couple wants to receive five electric can openers that cannot be returned. Therefore, it pays to do a little detective work.

Find out if the couple has arranged for a bridal registry at a place that stocks small appliances, kitchen and tableware. Also, inquire whether the bride and groom have any particular interests in cooking, baking or entertaining. The beauty of a bridal registry is the couple can exchange items and avoid duplication or unwanted gifts. Furthermore, if an item costs more than you want to spend, you can chip in with relatives and friends. If it's a colleague at work, invariably a staff member is appointed to buy the gift. A modest sum from each employee adds up to a reasonable amount.

If the bride or groom enjoy gourmet cooking, an electric breadmaker is a great gift. Since it is not a necessity, newlyweds would not ordinarily spring for it on their own. However, once it's in their possession, a breadmaker will be put to good use. Even modest cooks can create many different varieties of bread. Baking a two-pound loaf is possible without making a mess. And if the breadmaker has an automatic time-delay, a couple can rise and shine to the aroma of fresh bread. Some deluxe models can also be used to toast buns, bake cakes, make pizza or pasta dough and prepare preserves.

> Kitchen appliances are terrific time savers

Today's stand mixers, handmixers, blenders, food processors, toasters, toaster/ovens, coffeemakers and cookware are all built with the busy career person in mind. Unlike the contraptions of yesteryear, these products are terrific time-savers. A pressure cooker serves as the perfect vehicle for preparing healthy food in a jiffy. Flavour and nutrients are locked in and cooking times are reduced by two-thirds. Pressure cookers are ideal for preparing soups, roasts, puddings and vegetables. Look for models with patented safety release valves, safety plugs, handle locks and stay-cool replaceable handles. The latter should be ergonomically designed for comfort and ease of handling.

On the subject of safety, manufacturers of cordless electric kettles deserve credit for making great strides in craftsmanship. Numerous kitchen fires and burns have been prevented due to these cordless models with automatic switches. Furthermore, the kettle interior is easier to keep clean. Seek out one that has a separate power base, cool-touch handles, automatic shutoff, a drip-free removable cover and a drip-free spout.

In a two-career family, both husband and wife spend most weekdays at the workplace. At the end of the day, they look forward to lingering over a luscious meal. With the convenience of a slow oven, dinner is ready when the couple arrive home. Diverse recipes can be prepared ahead and placed in a slow cooker. Look for one with easy-to-grip handles that features a keep-warm setting as well as a tempered glass lid.

To conserve counter space and electric energy and prevent a mess, nothing beats a toaster oven that heats, toasts, broils and bakes. But some people are still hooked on the conventional toaster. Unlike the old-fashioned models, today's deluxe four-slice toasters are roomy enough to hold bagels, buns and rolls. With a light touch, it's easy to regulate defrost and browning elements.

The convection/microwave oven is another double-duty space-saver that is a boon to modern cooks. The convection mechanism ensures even baking and the oven can be used for defrosting and top-browning. Look for one with a full range of controls that includes auto shut-off and a non-stick interior surface.

Quick grilling indoors is simplified with lightweight modern grills that fit on a counter or tabletop. Some models are so efficient they grill the top and bottom of the food simultaneously. Furthermore, the fat drips directly into a tray. Look for a grill with an adjustable temperature control and a non-stick surface.

Coffee aficionados love a fine brew first thing in the morning that gets them off to a good start. Coffee makers vary from simple to supreme, but it's the fresh brew that counts. So choose a simple one or go for a sophisticated 12-cup model with a programmable digital clock timer and automatic shut-off. For a gift to please gourmet coffee drinkers and their friends, check out the latest cappuccino and espresso coffeemakers.

Wacky weddings a feature of the Mideast's only democracy

By MICHAEL FOX
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Many of the films I have seen recently have featured weddings. There have been monsoon weddings, Georgian late weddings and big fat Greek ones. But no movie could prepare the uninitiated for an Israeli wedding. You, who sympathize with the plight of average Israelis – subjected as they are to bombings, reserve duty, heavy taxes and road rage – do not know the half of it. Israelis also have to endure Israeli weddings.

Secular or religious, in Savyon or in Dimona, the ubiquitous feature of an Israeli wedding is the noise. It's not just that you can't hear what your neighbour at your table is saying – that could be the only good thing that happens to you all evening – but the din is so painful that if a political prisoner were subjected to it, he would make an emergency call to the B'Tselem human rights organization.

My wife and I have a standard wedding kit consisting of two sets of earplugs and a corkscrew. No explanation is needed for the earplugs, but without the latter, you can suffer the fate of Tantalus. There will be a bottle of wine on your table, but you will lack the means to open it. The waiter you ask to open the bottle will go off, purportedly to fetch a corkscrew, and, like Captain Oakes, will never be seen again.

The earplugs will remain handy during the blessed, but sadly brief, period that the music is switched off. Remember that the greatest bore in literature, Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, was also a wedding guest. Your neighbour at your table will tell you, not of an albatross (which reminds me of my trip to the Galapagos Islands – I can show you the photos when we next meet at a wedding), but of his prostate. The band's return will not silence him, and courtesy will require you to try to follow him by lip-reading.

And be careful if you bring a gift. According to a television program I saw recently, it is a solecism of the worst order to give the couple any gift other than money. I was amazed to learn that, among young Israelis, the parents do not pay for the wedding. The couple pays on the proven assumption that they will clear a substantial profit on the evening.

A minor compensation is that speeches are rare at Israeli weddings. It has been tried, but Israeli guests will not listen to speeches – even from their hosts. If you are really unlucky, you might, in place of a speech, get entertainment from the family. This generally takes the form of a song with inaudible but inordinately long verses that don't rhyme, sung by children who should be in bed and egged on by parents who should know better.

I have left the ceremony for last. Never be afraid of being late for the ceremony, because however late you are, the ceremony will be later. But eventually, it will take place.

And you should expect anything! Israeli ceremonies come in all shapes and sizes, but are always unpredictable. I was at one wedding where the officiating rabbi had liberally helped himself to the sacramental wine before the ceremony. He stood more or less upright while the bride, a skimpy bridal dress that just barely covered her nakedness, tripped down the aisle to the deafening sound of the music from Star Wars. When she arrived under the chupah, the rabbi somehow got through the Hebrew blessings, but was defeated by the tongue-twisting Aramaic of the marriage contract. He should have taken lessons from Mel Gibson.

To be fair – something I find it hard to be when it comes to weddings – the shameless mockery of the marriage service that is so common in this country is not generally found when the bride and groom are from traditional backgrounds. When the couple is religious, you would not see, as I have, the bride accompanied to the canopy by a samba band led by a shapely young woman clad in a bikini, playing the maracas.

You might well ask why, if they have such contempt for custom, people go through the travesty of what is, after all, a religious ritual. To understand why they do, you will need a little background.

In Israel there are two truths that we hold to be self-evident. The first is that Jerusalem is the eternal, indivisible capital of the Jewish people, and if I forget that, may my two typing fingers lose their cunning. The second is that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East.

I have been pondering this last axiom while reading about the issue that has lately dominated public discourse in the United States: gay marriage. It is not a question frequently debated here. Israel is not about to legalize same-sex marriage for the simple reason that it even raises obstacles to opposite-sex marriage. Democratic Israel – light unto the gentiles, beacon of enlightenment amid a fog of bigotry, island of freedom in a sea of oppression – has laws of personal status that would seem harsh to an ayatollah. I do not discuss here the archaic Jewish laws of divorce or the pitiful situation of the agunah, the wife who cannot trace her husband and is unable to remarry. My subject is marriage.

> Noise is the ubiquitous feature of an Israeli wedding

If half of a couple is not recognized as Jewish by Jewish law, as is the case with some half a million of Israel's new citizens from the former Soviet Union, they may not marry under Jewish law. If you are a cohen – born into the priestly caste – you may not marry a woman who has been divorced. If you are the product of such a union, or if you are the child of an adulterous union, you may not marry at all unless you are lucky enough to find an unfortunate person in the same position.

Fair enough, you might say. If you choose to marry according to religious law, you must abide by the rules, the rules in this case being those laid down over the centuries by Halachah. If you cannot have an Orthodox wedding, you can marry according to Conservative or Reform rites; or if you are not religiously inclined, you can always exercise the rights of the citizen of any Western democracy and marry under its civil laws. Well, no, actually, you can't. The only democracy in the Middle East does not permit civil marriage and insists that marriages only be conducted by an Orthodox rabbi.

When a bill for the legalization of civil marriage was recently introduced in the Knesset, it was roundly defeated. It found little support even among the supposed standard-bearers of civil rights. Government ministers from the Shinui party, elected on an anti-clericalist platform in the last general elections, betrayed their voters by abstaining. Perhaps even worse, most Knesset members from the once-great Labor Party failed to support it.

It remains a matter of astonishment to objective observers that an outwardly Western nation with democratic institutions still compels those of its citizens who wish to marry to do so according to the rites of a religion they may not believe in. The alternatives are unappealing. One is non-marriage. Couples live monogamously together in stable relationships and produce children without troubling to go through a ceremony that they regard as hollow. Others will leave the country in order to go through a civil marriage, which – strangely – is then recognized by Israeli law. The tourism industry in Cyprus has Israel's marriage laws to thank for much of its income.

But those who wish to regularize their union in Israel in the only way legally possible must go through an Orthodox ceremony. If they treat it with disrespect, can they be blamed?

An active cure for the night before

By BRURIA ATAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

We've all had those mornings. You know, the one where as you step out of bed you swear to yourself you'll never drink again.

Like all promises, inevitably, this one gets broken. And at special occasions, like a wedding, you can avoid, or at least reduce, a hangover by taking some moderate exercise

For someone who is athletic, the effects of alcohol can be more serious and even more dangerous than for a heavy-drinking couch potato. Having said that, physical activity can avert the morning-after hangover, says Esther Gonen, a sports dietitian.

The hangover is one of the most common effects of excessive drinking. It is caused by loss of fluids and dehydration, since alcohol is a diuretic. To avoid the discomfort, the usual advice is to eat well before drinking, preferably food with a relatively high fat content. This allows the stomach time to empty, the alcohol is absorbed more gradually and the enzyme that breaks down the alcohol can work more efficiently.

> Drink lots of water before going to bed

Nutritionists suggest drinking alcohol slowly and drinking lots of water before going to bed, in order to dilute the alcohol in the body. Another suggestion is drinking coffee with a light meal the next day.

Gonen has her own recommendation for avoiding a hangover, apart from all the good advice above: hangovers can be prevented or at least reduced by physical activity, which helps the body get rid of the alcohol rapidly. If you have overdone the drinking, a 30-minute walk or some other physical activity gives you a reasonable chance of avoiding a hangover.

Women suffer more from hangovers than men, Gonen says. Strong drink goes to their heads more quickly and remains in the system longer, because the enzyme that breaks down alcohol is found in a lower quantity in the female body than in the male.

Furthermore, the bulk and weight of the female body is typically less than that of the male, the amount of water in the body is less, and consequently the hangover effect is more extreme. If a man and a woman with the same body weight drink an identical amount of alcohol, its concentration in the woman's bloodstream will be higher.

Female athletes, says Gonen, are at even greater risk. The most common symptoms of a hangover in a woman are tiredness, dehydration and headaches; in a man sweating and vomiting.

Alcohol can harm the body in many ways, though the level of damage is individual and related to age, gender and genetic and environmental factors. Alcohol at first has a pick-me-up effect, and for that reason many depressed people drink. But after the initial sense of well-being, depression can set in. The loss of fluids that accompanies drinking can produce a rise in body temperature and even heat stroke.

Alcohol contains no important nutrients – no vitamins, minerals, fats, complex carbohydrates or protein – and if its calories are not exploited at once for energy, they turn into fat. Alcohol travels through the body in the bloodstream and affects all the body's systems: the brain, the stomach, the internal organs, the liver, the kidneys and the muscles.

In contrast to the conventional wisdom, Gonen says, alcohol does not warm up the body. The converse is true: the rush of warmth felt when drinking alcohol is caused by the dilation of the blood vessels, which allows heat to escape the body, but in reality, drinking produces heat loss.

Despite all this, not every alcoholic drink is harmful. Today it is understood that there is even some benefit to certain beverages if consumed in moderation. Red wine and beer contain substances that prevent blood clots, for example. Several recent studies suggest that an alcoholic drink daily can reduce the risk of developing Alzheimer's disease and other forms of dementia by 50 per cent.

The finding reinforces the claims for the health benefits of drinking in moderation as a defence against heart disease and stroke. Researchers credit the characteristic effect of alcohol in thinning the blood and reducing cholesterol levels as responsible for lowering the risk of dementia, a condition that is sometimes brought on by vascular problems.

Others believe that small quantities of alcohol stimulate the release of acetycholine, a chemical substance in the brain that improves learning and memory.

With all that, alcohol still falls under the definition of a drug, namely, "an active substance capable of changing the structure or activity of body tissue, and the emotional state or behavior of the user."

So, if you must drink at an upcoming simchah, drink in moderation and eat well. And, above all, make sure you don't drive.

Stephen Harper

Israel's security non-negotiable: Harper

A new party and a new leader – and he's leading in the polls. Stephen Harper, the head of the Conservative Party of Canada, even went so far as to predict last week that he will win a majority government in the June 28 federal election.

Harper and his fellow Conservatives have, on many occasions, spoken out forcefully for Israel, earning kudos from Jews angered by the Liberals' record on the Mideast.

Harper, 45, was elected leader of the Canadian Alliance in 2002. Last October, he signed a deal with Progressive Conservative leader Peter MacKay to create the Conservative Party, and he won the leadership in March.

The CJN has requested interviews with the leaders of the three main parties. Harper was first to respond. He spoke by phone to reporter Ron Csillag for 10 minutes last Thursday.

CJN: Can you talk about what a Conservative government would do to alter Canada's policy toward Israel, if at all?

Harper: Our Conservative party in the past, certainly under my leadership and in the past couple of years, has been very supportive of the State of Israel. Like all Canadians, we want to [see], eventually, a democratic Palestine co-exist with a secure Israel. But the security of Israel,

Canadian Jewish Congress 27th plenary assembly

OTTAWA — Amid the stories of doom and gloom, rising anti-Semitism and violence in the Middle East, there is still reason for hope and optimism, said presenters at the 27th plenary assembly of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Four hundred people from across Canada met at the Westin Hotel on Sunday to welcome the incoming slate of officers who will lead the CJC for the next three years, as well as to vote on resolutions that will affect the direction of the organization and to discuss issues of importance to the Canadian Jewish community.

*Passion*ate Beatification

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League is upset about the Vatican's plans to beatify a nun whose visions inspired Mel Gibson's The Passion. The beatification – the last step before sainthood – of Anne Catherine Emmerich could harm interfaith relations, the ADL said in a statement. Some of the more controversial scenes in the film came from a book attributed to Emmerich, who lived from 1774 to 1824.

Herzl Honoured

PARIS — Paris' city council is naming a street or square after Theodor Herzl. A resolution on the matter was unanimously adopted by council last week. Herzl reported on the trial of Capt. Alfred Dreyfus from Paris, which led him to believe the only solution for the Jewish people was the creation of a Jewish state. Herzl wrote his utopian vision of a future Jewish state in a Paris hotel. Meanwhile, Budapest marked the 100th anniversary of Herzl's death last week at the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. He was born in Budapest on May 2, 1860.

Libel Suit Dismissed

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. — A Jewish woman who sued Jews for Jesus for saying she was a follower of the group had her case dismissed last month on the grounds it's not defamatory to call someone a Christian or a believer in Jesus. Edith Rapp of Delray Beach, Fla., sued the missionary group late last year for $1 million (US) because it did not answer requests for an apology and retraction of a statement in its newsletter that said she tearfully accepted Jesus when her husband was dying.

Birthright Israel Gets 5-year Reprieve

JERUSALEM — Birthright Israel has pledged to continue the program for five more years.

The commitment was made official last week at a meeting in Israel of Birthright's steering committee, comprising Israeli government leaders, philanthropists and representatives of the North American Jewish federation system.

The program, which provides free trips to Israel for Diaspora youth, has suffered shortfalls in funding from the federation system and the Israeli government. It hopes to boost participation from 18,000 in 2004 to 20,000 in 2005.

Despite the length of the pledge, noted Robert Aronson, CEO of the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Detroit and the federation system's liaison to Birthright, funding operates on a "year-to-year basis."

Aronson said that "the federations have come up with a guarantee of funding for this year and next year," but the Israeli government's commitment for next year is still "up in the air."

Greens Pull Poster

BERLIN — The German Green Party withdrew a campaign poster with an anti-Israel slogan. A representative of the party, which is a partner in Germany's governing coalition, apologized to the Israeli ambassador for a European Parliament campaign poster with a photo of a London peace march featuring the banner "Victory to the Intifada."

Security Beefed Up

SYDNEY — Australia's main Jewish community is spending $13 million (Cdn) to beef up security against terrorist and anti-Semitic attacks. It has also hired 1,000 unarmed guards to protect Jewish sites and is meeting with police and intelligence agencies. Jeremy Jones, head of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, said hundreds of Jews will also act as observers for police. During the recent trial of Jack Roche, who admitted to a plot to bomb the Israeli Embassy, plans were revealed to attack Melbourne businessman Joseph Gutnick.

Murder Probe Sought

VILNIUS — The Simon Wiesenthal Center is calling for Lithuania to probe evidence about the participation of the country's basketball players in a wartime massacre of Jews. The centre protested after the Lithuanian prosecutor dismissed evidence last week the Perkunas team killed Jews as a prize for beating a German team in a July 1941 game.

Art Lawsuit OK'd

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that a California woman can sue Austria to recoup art stolen by the Nazis. The court ruled 6-3 last week that Americans can sue foreign countries for actions taken before U.S. laws restricting such lawsuits were passed. Maria Altmann, who fled Austria, sued the country to retrieve six paintings it displayed in the Austrian Gallery after the Nazis stole them, including two depicting her aunt. The ruling also could allow Holocaust survivors to sue European countries for their actions during that era.

Crackdown Promised

PARIS — France pledged to respond more firmly to anti-Semitic attacks as it released figures last week showing Jews were still attacked or threatened with violence at a rate of more than one case a day. The justice ministry registered 180 anti-Semitic acts from Jan. 1 to June 6 – 104 against property, 46 against people and 30 published anti-Jewish writings. The figures indicated a fall in anti-Semitic violence in France, which saw 588 attacks and threats against Jews last year and a high of 923 in 2002.

March of the Living set to expand in 2005

Will mark 60th anniversary of liberation of Nazi concentration camps

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Every spring since 1988, as Jews around the world mark Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day), thousands of young people travel to Poland and then on to Israel as part of the March of the Living.

An average of 7,000 high-school students make the trip each year, but organizers have something special planned for 2005. To mark the 60th anniversary of the Allied victory in Europe and the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps, March of the Living coordinators have set their sights on bringing 18,000 people to Poland.

To attain that ambitious number, they are reaching out to Holocaust survivors, educators, older students and Christian friends of Israel, who they hope will sign on to the historic program.

David Machlis, international vice-chair of March of the Living, was in Toronto recently to promote the program to representatives of Jewish organizations and evangelical Christian groups.

His pitch: 2005 might well be the last opportunity to bring large numbers of survivors to Europe to bear witness to the Nazi barbarity that claimed six million Jewish lives.

At the same time, March of the Living is sending invitations to leaders such as Russian President Vladimir Putin, former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani, and Polish and Israeli officials to take part in the auspicious anniversary, he said.

Organizers are hoping that as many as 1,000 survivors and their children will go to Poland, where their presence will inspire and educate younger participants, Machlis said.

The program is meaningful for both survivors and the young people who participate, said Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada and a member of the organization's international committee.

"We realize that, unfortunately, survivors don't live forever," he said. "We want to get as many survivors on the program as possible to say kaddish for their dead relatives."

For survivors, being in Auschwitz-Birkenau and seeing Jewish dignitaries such as the chief rabbi of Israel honoured, as occurred in past trips, while young people proudly fly Israeli flags, "gives them hope," he added.

For student participants, "there is no better or stronger lesson" than seeing "this horrific site through the eyes of a survivor." It also serves as a timely reminder of the consequences of anti-Semitism. "The message is, 'Look what happens when you let things go,'" Machlis said.

Machlis has been working for the past several months to expand March of the Living to include evangelical Protestant and Roman Catholic participants.

Recently, he and Abraham Hirchson, founder of March of the Living, were invited to a prayer breakfast for the well-being of the State of Israel sponsored by the Religious Roundtable, an umbrella group of evangelical organizations that met in Memphis, Tenn. Hirchson was invited to deliver one of two keynote addresses to the prayer meeting and took the opportunity to discuss next year's march.

March of the Living is currently in the process of reaching out to Catholic educators already involved in Holocaust education, and last month Machlis met with Eugene Fisher, director of inter-religious relations for the U. S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Our duty to know

From the editor's desk

One of the chief reasons for the pessimism that some people feel about the chances for coexistence in the near future between Israel and the Palestinians, indeed between Israel and its Muslim neighbours, is the recent, seemingly unrestrained proliferation in the Arab world of anti-Semitic expression.

Ron Rosenbaum, the renowned journalist and author, has carefully chronicled this very worrisome modern development in his new book Those Who Forget: The Question of Anti-Semitism.

In an interview with The CJN (see page 43) he succinctly characterized the situation by saying: "Hitlerism is alive and well in the Arab world."

As with all conditions of prejudice, bigotry and hatred, it is inappropriate to look to the victims, the objects of the prejudice, to implement strategies for ridding the haters of their hatred. Only the bearers of the bacillus of anti-Semitism, for example, can sufficiently change their ways and their attitudes so as to heal themselves of that age-old illness.

But the victims do have a duty to themselves and to society at large to be as informed as possible about the activities and the identities of the bearers of hatred. First and foremost, it is a matter of survival, but it is also a matter of working for the betterment of the world.

There are many agencies and organizations throughout the Jewish world that are the "antennae" of our community, picking up, recording and disseminating information about the purveyors of hatred.

One such organization is the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. Based in Israel, the centre publishes monthly bulletins on a range of public policy issues affecting the Jewish world. (In this week's paper, CJN columnist Lawrence Hart also points to the work of the centre.)

In the June 1 issue of the centre's publication Post-Holocaust and Anti-Semitism, co-publisher Manfred Gerstenfeld records an interview with Joel Kotek, a political scientist at the Free University of Brussels, on the subject of Arab-inspired anti-Semitism.

Kotek has just written a landmark study on the anti-Semitic images that appear in the Arab world. Published in French, the title of the book translates as "In the Name of Anti-Semitism: The Image of the Jews and Israel in Caricature Since the Second Intifadah."

Kotek's book was based on 2½ years of research and examines about 2,000 sordid images. He categorized the cartoons he examined into 10 themes.

I reproduce Gerstenfeld's précis of those categories:

1. The oldest anti-Semitic motif, demonization of the Jew. In the Islamic world, the Jew's status – like that of Christians – is that of a dhimmi, a second-class citizen.

2. Deicide. Originally, a Christian motif, the Islamic world has appropriated the theme to engender sympathy among Christians. Israeli soldiers are often depicted as Roman soldiers in their confrontations with Palestinian children, who are made to suffer horribly in those depictions.

3. Israel as a Nazi state. This is based on two contradictory allegations, which Islamists try to reconcile: "that the Shoah never happened, but that if it did, it has caused more damage to the Palestinians because they are being treated worse than the Nazis treated the Jews."

4. Zoomorphism. It dehumanizes the Jews by turning them into animals, such as snakes, pigs and cockroaches.

5. Masters of the world. This echoes the classic conspiracy theme, that the Jews control the world.

6. A corrupting force. This is a derivative of the theme that Jews dominate the world with their money.

7. Blood libel. This too originates in Christian anti-Semitism. "In today's Arab world, this image of unbridled hatred has mutated into the alleged quest for Palestinian blood… There were so many of these cartoons that I could select only a few for my book. Blood-drinking Jews are frequently shown…"

8. Infanticide. "This is the most extreme image… the concept that the Jews not only murder, but preferably target children."

9. Arabs want peace; Israel does not. "Israel is a 'perfidious' country which does not want peace."

10. Apologies for suicide bombers and terrorism. These cartoons called for outright murder. I did not find a single [cartoon] depicting the Israeli as a civilian. He is always a soldier or an ultra-Orthodox Jew. He has no father, mother or child."

Among his conclusions, Kotek writes that the many aspersions against Israel have also begun to permeate Western European society, as they resonate with the long-standing prejudices against Jews there.

This is not pleasant reading; but it is vital that we know – for our own sake and for the world.

As readers will learn by reading his column in today's paper, this is Robert Sarner's last column as a regular contributor.

Robert has been a sharp-eyed, incisive observer of the ordinary rhythms, pressures, and paces of the hurly-burly, poignant, sweet and bitter existence we call Israeli life. We thank him for having shared his observations with us and wish him the very best of good luck in all his endeavours.

CCCJ forum members urge curbing of hatred

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

While the Canadian mosaic is recognized as being a model for the world, "recent events have proven that hatred is alive and well, even in this great country of ours," said Alan Schwartz, president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ), at a recent multi-faith forum.

"Newly released Statistics Canada data indicate that 43 per cent of hate crime in Canada is religion-based, with 25 per cent of hate crimes directed at Jews and 11 per cent at Muslims. This is just not acceptable and cannot be allowed to continue unchecked," he told guests, among them clerics representing the Buddhist, Christian, Hindu, Jewish, Muslim and Sikh religions.

Mayor David Miller, Minister of Multiculturalism Jean Augustine and Imam Syed Muhammad Rizvi of the Jaʻfari Islamic Centre spoke about the need to curb hatred and the role education plays in building a just and equitable society.

Imam Rizvi said, "We are going through a time which is indeed a time of test and trial for all religions and all nations."

Augustine warned of the danger of complacency. "I think all of us are here because we recognize that to do nothing is to do something. And to say nothing is to say something," she said. "In other words, to remain silent and indifferent is the greatest sin of all."

She said the Canadian government is concerned about racism, hate and discrimination, and public education is a key element of Canada's multicultural program.

Imam Rizvi added that the task of creating awareness of intolerance should start at the early stages of a child's upbringing and that school systems should be "more proactive on this issue."

Schwartz said the CCCJ is expanding its existing programs and developing new initiatives designed to expose young people to the values, traditions and customs of the religions that contribute to Toronto's diversity.

One of the council's vehicles for promoting "interfaith dialogue and understanding," said CCCJ national executive director Amanda Sherrington, is the Schools Interfaith Program.

Since the program's launch two years ago, nearly 10,000 student participants have visited Buddhist, Hindu and Sikh temples, churches, mosques and synagogues, and learned about native peoples' faiths at their community centres, she said.

Michal Gill, vice-principal of Jewish studies at United Synagogue Day School (USDS), Bathurst campus, told the guests at the forum that the program has given her students "the opportunity to broaden their horizons."

Bonnie Abramsky, a Grade 9 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, spoke at the forum about her experience with the schools program last year at USDS.

"Many times, our only understanding of others is what we see on TV or read in the newspaper," she said. "Many times, this information is not a true reflection.

"The Schools Interfaith Program has made me realize that we are all a branch on this tree of life. Whether it be a big branch or a small leaf, we all play a part in this world. It is programs like this that will allow us all to contribute more positively to the community around us."

At the forum, the CCCJ unveiled the new Schools Interfaith in Action Award, which will honour a student and the school he or she attends. It will recognize a student who has made "an outstanding effort to build community understanding and respect for others of different faiths and ethnic backgrounds," Sherrington said.

All students in the CCCJ's Schools Interfaith Program will be eligible for the award, which includes a crystal sculpture designed by Mark Raynes-Roberts and a cash prize.

ISRAEL DAY FESTIVAL: The 9th annual Israel Day festival, sponsored by Canadian Zionist Federation, was held at Mel Lastman Square on June 9. It included a live stage show with school choirs, dance groups, live bands and featured artists, plenty of food, an Israeli marketplace, a live auction and activities for children.

AG consents to hate charges for anti-Semitic incidents

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Three teenagers charged in connection with a spate of anti-Semitic vandalism incidents in north Toronto earlier this year will face hate promotion charges in addition to charges of mischief.

Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant said last week that he has "consented to the laying of wilful promotion of hatred charges against these individuals."

A hate crime "is one of the most serious crimes that we have in our criminal justice system," Bryant said.

The new charges carry a maximum sentence of two years in jail. The three young men, Steven Vandermay, 18, and two 15-year-olds who cannot be identified, also face charges of mischief causing damage in excess of $5,000 and mischief under $5,000. The first mischief charge carries a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison, the second, up to two years in jail.

Bryant noted that if the suspects are convicted on the mischief charges, the presiding judge could consider the hate motivation as an aggravating factor and increase the sentences.

The three were arrested on March 30 after a string of incidents that saw windows broken at the Pride of Israel synagogue, swastikas daubed on UJA street signs, damage at a Jewish school and 27 headstones toppled at the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery.

Earlier, several homes and cars in Vaughan, north of Toronto, were smeared with swastikas, while in subsequent incidents, cemeteries were vandalized in Brantford and Kitchener. No arrests have been made in the other cases.

At the time, political and religious leaders condemned the attacks and stood in solidarity with the Jewish community.

Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the attorney-general's announcement.

"The bottom line is that while we were very gratified for the words of support from leaders at various rallies, this is putting words into action," said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Congress.

"These actions speak volumes to the seriousness that the government attaches to such hateful acts and the commitment of the government to ensure that Canada remains a place for all Canadians."

Concert honours disabled Israeli soldiers

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

For Israel's disabled veterans and victims of terror, the real battle begins after the war and never ends, said Shirley Solomon, MC of Beit Halochem Canada's recent A Celebration of Life concert.

The annual fundraising event, held June 3 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, honoured these Israelis for paying a heavy price for their country's independence and survival.

It featured singer Michael Burgess, who entertained the audience of about 1,650 with songs from Phantom of the Opera and Les Miserables, as well as the Beit Halochem Wheelchair Dancers, the Zemmer Singers and stories of victims determined to return to "a normal way of life," said Toby Feldberg, president of Beit Halochem Canada.

"Our performance and soldiers exemplify a celebration of life," Feldberg said. "At tonight's concert, we will witness their triumph first hand."

The night was also an opportunity for Beit Halochem to thank volunteers and supporters for their contributions to a very worthy cause, she said.

"It is of utmost importance to remember that the need to raise funds is greater than ever. We must purchase necessary equipment in the Beit Halochem centres in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa and Nahariya. These centres provide the emotional and physical rehabilitation needed not only for the veterans, but also for their families," she said.

Therapy sessions, sport, cultural and art activities are some of the services the centres offer the more than 50,000 disabled Israeli war veterans, Feldberg said.

"Beit Halochem has dedicated itself to helping those who gave us the maximum they could give."

Beit Halochem Canada paid for 10 Israeli veterans to come share in the concert celebration. One of the veterans, Daniel Ben Shabat, thanked the organization and the volunteers who welcomed them into their houses for two weeks.

"The feeling of family does not end after the two weeks are up," he said. "We will always be willing to open our homes to you in Israel."

Some of the soldiers shared tales of rebuilding their lives after crippling injuries, saying the key has been finding joy through hardship.

"In spite of everything, life is still so very beautiful," said Maytal Wax, a young woman whose leg was shattered in a terror attack in Jerusalem.

Sheri Ben Aroya, a former intelligence soldier, was badly injured in the 2002 Passover terror attack on the Park Hotel in Netanya. She suffered major head injuries, lost sight in her right eye, developed chronic nasal problems and lost the use of her right arm and leg.

Two years later, having re-learned to speak and walk, she said, "Before my injuries, I would smile at 50 per cent. Now I smile at 100 per cent."

Shlomo Pinto, paralyzed from the waist down since the Yom Kippur War, was recognized for his motivation to live life to its fullest. Through vigorous training, Pinto became a sports hero in Israel and has won many gold medals in the Paralympic Games for swimming.

Andre Pak, a former sergeant who served in the Border Watch Unit, received a medal for his bravery. During a terror attack on an Israeli bus, Pak ran to rescue his commander, but was shot and injured. He is now paralyzed and confined to a wheelchair.

Beit Halochem's wheelchair dancers, known in Hebrew as Hora Galgalim, gave a number of upbeat performances. Paired with able-bodied partners, they showcased a unique style of folk-dancing to the music of Carmela Cabara and Osnat Zeno, the Zemmer Singers duo.

Our sages would be proud

Though quite familiar with the constant rigours and hardships of "ordinary" daily life, our ancient sages nevertheless required a great deal of their people. First and foremost, always, was the obligation to be responsible one for the other, to pay heed to and be concerned for the condition of their neighbours.

They encouraged their co-religionists to be involved in the life of the community. In stronger terms, they enjoined the people never to separate themselves from trying to respond to the needs of the wider public. In effect, more than 2,000 years ago, our wise and compassionate sages established the formula for Jewish communal life wherever Jews would live throughout the ensuing ages.

That formula has been the operative instruction for Jewish communities around the world and their lay and professional leaders to this very day. In Canada, the most storied, most loyal practitioner of that formula has been the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). For 85 years, the CJC has had one single, recurring beat coursing strength and purpose through its heart: the wellbeing of fellow Jews. To be sure, over the years, as the community matured, so too did the CJC's mandate to include the wellbeing of Canadian society at large. But no organization historically has been more intertwined with the wellbeing of the Jews of Canada than the CJC.

Last week in Ottawa, the CJC convened for its 27th plenary assembly. Although unavoidably truncated due to the intervention of the federal election, the gathering still managed to focus a laser-sharp spotlight on two key issues: global anti-Semitism, and combating the threat of terrorism to collective and individual security.

But if we did not comment on the plenary's other key business, the official transition of the CJC leadership from Keith Landy to Ed Morgan, we would fail our sages by breaching another of their important operational instructions: always acknowledge the good that others do for you.

Both men are avatars of integrity and distinction, broad-shouldered bearers of the burdens of responsibility, keen students of our sages' teachings and worthy "inheritors" of past CJC presidents such as Sam Bronfman, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, Irving Abella and Irwin Cotler.

These past 3½ years have not been easy ones for the Jews of Canada, nor have they been for Jews around the world. In response to heightened anxieties – at home and abroad – Jewish advocacy in Canada has undergone deep organizational restructuring. The CJC is now part of the wider Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) umbrella. Landy was called upon to integrate CJC into CIJA. Now, with a refined mandate and anticipated new resources from CIJA, it falls to Morgan to build upon CJC's acknowledged strengths – its grassroots, national, representative, 85-year base of experience, goodwill and expertise – to burnish CJC's historic mission within the remodelled CIJA framework.

Our sages would be proud. And so should we.

Anti-Liberal ad misleading

I would like to respond to the statements made in the advertisement in The Canadian Jewish News, June 10, signed by Robert Landau, which are disingenuous and misleading in their claims that Canada has provided no assistance to Israel and some $215 million in assistance to the Palestinians over the last 10 years.

First, Israel, as a developed country, is not eligible to receive foreign aid. However, annual trade between Canada and Israel under the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement alone amounts to almost $800 million. This is in addition to the benefits Israel receives under the Canada-Israel Co-operation in Scientific, Academic and Cultural Matters Program and the Canada-Israel Legal Co-operation Program (all initiatives of the Liberal government).

Second, the humanitarian assistance provided by Canada to the Palestinians does not go through the Palestinian Authority, but through accredited international agencies such as the World Bank, and it is monitored accordingly. An accounting of the monies given is required so as to guard against misappropriation.

Israel also provides assistance to the Palestinians and has itself requested that Canada do so. Indeed, the Israeli government has characterized the relationship between itself and Canada as "excellent" and has described Canada as "one of Israel's best friends."

Furthermore, "respect for the security, well-being and legitimacy of the State of Israel" has been described as "a cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy," and Canada considers all acts of terror, from whatever source and for whatever purpose, as contrary to both Canadian and international law. Also, Canada has maintained Israel's right, like that of any other state, to self-defence against acts of terror.

It is highly inaccurate and irresponsible to suggest that the Liberal government is anything but a friend of the State of Israel.

Important human rights issue

In 1999, the UN human rights committee found that Canada was violating the cornerstone human rights treaty that it had agreed (with the consent of all provinces) to uphold. Canada was in breach by fully funding the faith-based education of more than 600,000 Catholic children while providing nothing for the faith-based education of other religions. It is Canada, and not Ontario, that has the international obligation to remedy this discrimination.

The Liberal government, with Paul Martin as finance minister, flatly refused to take steps within its power, most notably implementing tax credits, to remedy this illegal discrimination in the face of Ontario's refusal at the time to address the issue.

Are there issues of greater importance to the Canadian Jewish community than remedying state-sponsored discrimination against Jews and other minorities and preserving Jewish continuity by ensuring affordable access to Jewish education?

Discrimination against religious minorities in open violation of international law is not just an issue of importance for the families affected, who bear a heavy and unnecessary burden of tuition. It is an affront to our entire community, and every Canadian who opposes discrimination.

Aaron Blumenfeld, Ira Walfish, Co-Presidents
Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools

Criticizes Hazineh statement

While Sheldon Kirshner captured very well the ambience and the content of the positions articulated by Ami Ayalon and Sari Nusseibeh, co-founders of The People's Voice Initiative, in their recent presentation at Holy Blossom ("Peace is possible: former Shin Bet head," CJN, May 13), there was important information that was not reported.

During the opening portion of the evening, Joan Garson of ARZA, the Zionist arm of Reform Judaism, introduced the issues and spoke positively of the need for peace and the possibilities of a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Sadly, this was not reciprocated by Elias Hazineh, president of Palestine House and a co-sponsor of this event. Hazineh made it clear that while Palestine House was a co-sponsor, it did not accept Nusseibeh and Ayalon's position that if there were a two-state solution, displaced Palestinians could only return to a newly created Palestinian state. Indeed Hazineh stated that in his opinion, these Palestinians had an automatic "right of return" to the State of Israel.

Such a statement at an event that was trying to bridge the gap between Palestinians and Jews is counterproductive to peace. Those who espouse a so-called "right of return" for displaced Palestinians to the Jewish state in fact deny the possibility of a two-state solution. More to the point, they are telling our community that their ultimate aim is the dismemberment of the Jewish state. What this sadly demonstrates is that while moderate Palestinians like Nusseibeh look for options to peace, mainstream Canadian Palestinian organizations such as Palestine House reject such moderation and overtures. Hardly a way to construct a bridge of peace between our communities.

The Rebbe's legacy, 10 years on

By RABBI Z. AHRON GROSSBAUM

All of us go through life with the challenge of making every day count and each act meaningful. Regrettably, all too often, the days roll over one after the other with little distinction, and soon enough we find ourselves celebrating another birthday. Consequently, when the opportunity for introspection presents itself, we search for intermittent points of reference to help us create a mental diary – events of global proportion that stimulate every human fibre and remain etched in our mind forever.

The third day of Tammuz, ten years ago, was just such a day. Indeed, it fell on the very day when the sun's orbit was temporarily suspended so that Joshua could lead the Jews, in broad daylight, into the Promised Land. But this time, at this juncture in history, global Jewish life experienced a tremor. The heavens opened and welcomed the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Schneerson of blessed memory. Jews everywhere, while mourning the loss of the most outstanding leader of world Jewry, shared their pessimistic view as to the future of Chabad Chassidism. They questioned the staying power of thousands of individual followers and the continuity of the worldwide network of outreach branches he established.

Indeed, while acknowledging the Rebbe's brilliant mind, global vision, and immutable spirit, intellectuals, leaders and journalists painted a bleak picture. They could not fathom how such an enormous structure that extended its reach to the four corners of the world but was anchored by the charismatic leadership of one person – the Rebbe – could possibly continue. In fact, the only variable among the naysayers was the time remaining on the Rebbe's watch. They asked, "How could a system that reached out to Jews everywhere and bridged Jews of the West with those of the East, built Torah institutions where Sephardi and Ashkenazi students studied side by side, and established a presence against all odds in remote communities, continue unabated?" Indeed, from a sociological perspective, the odds were not favourable and without precedent.

Yes, as we commemorate the 10th anniversary of the Rebbe's passing, it's time for reflection. But first, let us consider the facts on the ground.

During the last decade, Chabad has opened numerous day schools, high schools and yeshivot around the world. Chabad Houses have sprung up at some 30 campuses across the country, and magnificent Chabad synagogue centres grace the landscape in cities that just a few years ago were bereft of any organized Jewish presence. These facilities are manned by literally hundreds of newlyweds who have graciously elected to serve as shluchim and bring the light and warmth of Yiddishkeit to fledgling Jewish communities, be they in Athens, Ga., Akron, Ohio, or Anchorage, Alaska. In fact, as time marches on, these young and brave assume remote postings that just a few years ago would have been considered beyond the pale, bringing new meaning to the Rebbe's call of "Ufaratzta" – "And you shall spread forth."

Rabbi Menachem Schneerson

> 'How could a system that reached out to Jews everywhere and bridged Jews of the West with those of the East, built Torah institutions where Sephardi and Ashkenazi students studied side by side, and established a presence against all odds in remote communities, continue unabated?'

Drawing on the Rebbe's teaching and inspiration, all forms of communication technology have been employed to enable hundreds of thousands to become knowledgeable about our rich heritage and to enhance their level of observance.

Yes, even today, individuals and families continue to study the scholarly works of the Rebbe, embrace the ideas and ideals that he expounded and consider themselves his Chassidim, notwithstanding the fact they never had an opportunity to interact in some tangible way with the Rebbe.

What is the secret formula that has proven so potent to not only retain the bond but to actually create and then nurture a genuine relationship between Rebbe and Chassid?

In the painful hours and days after the Rebbe's passing, each Chassid engaged in heart-wrenching introspection, examining the depth of his heart and soul. He soon came to the realization that his love for, and affinity with, the Rebbe was immutable. It reached beyond the joy of the Rebbe's brilliance, wholehearted concern and selfless devotion. The Rebbe's unconditional acceptance of every person penetrated the innermost recesses of the soul, forming a bond that transcended all physical limitations. In summation, each and every Chassid resolved to maintain this spiritual link with newfound resilience.

These sentiments mirror the philosophical teachings penned by Rabbi Schneer Zalman in a letter offering condolences to the disciples of Rabbi Menachem Mendle of Vitebsk. He writes that the lives of the truly righteous are not of a conventional nature, constrained and subjected to corporeal needs, but are dedicated exclusively to Divine service. The soul rules supreme and the body serves merely as a tool to fulfill the will of God. Throughout their lifetime, the righteous few are the embodiment of an all-embracing love for God, an absolute sense of awe, and they personify perfect faith. These lofty attributes, being exclusively of a spiritual nature, cannot be contained by the bodily "vessel," nor restricted by the limitations of time and space imposed on all physical matter. Thus they permeate the environment with an aura of holiness that continues to hover over their followers even after the tzaddik's passing. All that remains for one to do is link mind to mind, heart to heart, and soul to soul.

Indeed, like all chassidic thought, this too, finds its origin in Torah, Talmud and the philosophical treatises of medieval Jewish scholars. The common theme in all is that there is life that the eye cannot see but the heart feels, that there is communication between one soul and another. The challenge remains to always be cognizant of this fusion and make sure that it stays embedded in our psyche.

Today, 10 years after the Rebbe's passing, is an appropriate time to re-examine our status and stature. Whether one considers himself a disciple, supporter or friend, some soul-searching is warranted. Let us rededicate ourselves to the sacred mission set in motion over the course of five decades – the ideas and ideals of the Rebbe. Indeed, if we serve as the head, hands and feet of the Rebbe, we can rest assured that the Rebbe will serve as our soul. Together we can perfect the world and then, very soon, greet Mashiach.

Rabbi Grossbaum has been the Rebbe's shaliach to Toronto for the last 30 years. He heads the network of Chabad institutions throughout Southern Ontario.

Opinions

The new anti-Semitism

A particularly noxious letter to the editor was published in the Hamilton Spectator recently under the heading "Gaza ghetto: shame on Israel and on the world's bystanders." The letter writer focused principally on the wounding of a member of his extended family by stray bullets that were allegedly fired during the recent IDF operation in Rafah.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

However, without mentioning who was in fact responsible for causing injury to his "grandchildren's other grandma," he then frames his grievances within a scathing attack on Israel, referring to it as a "rogue state" that has created in Gaza "a prison patrolled on all sides by the occupying army of Israel, a largely Jewish state."

In his concluding paragraph, he chastises everyone for "allowing the continuing abuse and attempted genocide of the Palestinian people." And "shame," he says, "on Israel," for "inflicting the same crimes against humanity that the world so justly condemned when such actions were inflicted on European Jews."

If such invective was new or surprising, this letter might have seemed that much more appalling. Sadly, however, we are seeing an ever increasing, and mostly uncontested, outpouring of ugly revisionism that has now begun to permeate even relatively moderate political discourse.

When referring to some of the terminology that underpins this sort of dialect, Joel Fishman, an associate of the Jerusalem Institute for Public Affairs, has elegantly stated in a recent issue of Jerusalem Viewpoints that such language "generally contains accusations and embodies a propaganda technique known as the 'reversal of culpability,' which imposes a false historical analogy on the present. Thus, Goliath becomes David and David becomes Goliath. The most widespread use of this technique applies to the accusation of 'genocide,' which carries the fraudulent assertion that Israel is doing to the Palestinians what the Nazis did to the Jews."

Such "nazification" of Israel and the Jewish people is quintessential Holocaust inversion that, in the words of columnist Melanie Phillips in The Spectator, March 22, 2003, serves to systematically delegitimize and dehumanize Israel and Jews – as a necessary prelude to their destruction.

Phillips also refers to anti-Semitism's tendency to mutate. "Now," she says, "it has changed again, into a shape which requires a new way of thinking and a new vocabulary."

Given this dire reality, our community needs to use all of its available resources to bring the threat of this new thinking and this new vocabulary to wider public attention. Governments and media – particularly those on the left of the political spectrum – need to understand that failing to take prompt action against all manifestations of this new anti-Semitism might be just the catalyst for further assaults on Jews and Jewish interests, both in Israel and beyond its borders.

On the move, again

A few days ago, as I rode my bike to work, I ran into a lizard. Not literally, but almost. Although I was going at a fair speed, it fortunately managed to scurry off to the side just in time. This was not my first such encounter.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Over the years, I have often spotted chameleons while travelling through Jerusalem on my bike. My route to work takes me along the city's lone bike path, which is also frequented by local lizards.

It's only since moving to Israel that I discovered real, live urban lizards. I don't remember ever seeing such reptiles in a city setting when I lived in Canada, France and Switzerland. In Israel, tradition has it that coming across a lizard brings good luck.

As a longtime resident of Jerusalem, I am no longer surprised by the sight of these wily creatures. But this time, my reaction was different. This time, I flashed on the realization that pretty soon I would no longer be running into lizards.

Such thoughts have been recurring with increasing frequency since my wife and I decided to leave Israel. Early this summer, with mixed feelings and a certain trepidation, we will be moving to Canada with our three children.

For me, taking leave of Israel is loaded with all kinds of thoughts and emotions. Most of them have nothing to do with lizards or other forms of wildlife. When you are as attached and devoted to Israel as I am, when Israel is so much a part of you, you don't leave it easily. Such a move is anything but casual.

Many factors, both personal and professional, entered into our decision – from a desire for change and new challenges, to providing a different horizon for our children free of the constant threat of terrorism, to wanting to recharge our professional batteries and reconnect with relatives, old friends and former colleagues, among other reasons. My wife and I feel it will all add up to a highly positive, constructive experience for us as a family and as individuals.

We are looking forward to an invigorating change. We are not looking forward to being away from Israel. We know we will miss it terribly. We know that ultimately we will be back.

A quarter-century after leaving Canada to live in France, 14 years after leaving Paris for Israel, I am again on the move. Next week, I will be trading Jerusalem for Toronto as part of a major new chapter in my life and the life of my family.

Next month, for the first time in 6½ years, I will not be writing my regular column for The Canadian Jewish News. For me, it's the end of an era in more ways than one. Every four weeks since late 1997, I have had a regular rendezvous on this page with CJN readers.

To write from Jerusalem is to have one of the most compelling datelines in modern journalism. To have a regular column in which you alone choose what you write about is to have a cherished position in any publication.

All told, it's been a wonderful journey. Through more than 80 columns and some 60,000 words, I've tried to explore aspects of Israel and to share slices of my life in Jerusalem with readers far removed, at least physically, from the Middle East.

I couldn't sign off this final column without paying tribute to the editorial staff of the CJN. Particularly to the copy editors whose attentive work enhanced my writing and made me look better on the page.

I owe a special thanks to Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of The CJN. He contacted me in the fall of 1997 while visiting Israel to propose that I do a regular column from Jerusalem. I will be forever glad that he did, and thankful for his support through the years.

Lastly, I want to thank you, the readers of The CJN, many of whom have written to me over the years in response to something in my column. Whether critical or laudatory, I've appreciated hearing from all of you.

It has been a pleasure for me to be a columnist in The CJN. I look forward to the next time I will be reporting in these pages on the road ahead, with or without lizards. Until we meet again, in print or elsewhere.

Olympic truce? How about 16 hate-free days

In the glory days of Athens and Sparta, the period of the Olympic games was accompanied by a temporary halt in the various wars that were raging at the time throughout the Greek empire. According to historians, the pause in pan-Hellenic fighting lasted for 16 days while athletes and spectators were ensured a safe passage to the site of the events and back home again.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Now, as the modern Olympics return to Athens, where they began in 1896, proposals have been floated to revive this concept, in the form of a worldwide truce. According to George Papandreou, the former Greek foreign minister who is vice-chairman of the International Olympic Truce Center, "If we can have peace for 16 days, then maybe, just maybe, we can have it forever".

But like so many other well-intentioned proposals, it is difficult to avoid seeing the Olympic truce effort as another hopeful, but entirely unrealistic, effort to avoid the bitter reality of the wars and violence, particularly in the Middle East. Surely Al Qaeda terrorists and other armed groups in Iraq, Afghanistan, Indonesia and elsewhere cannot be expected to take these idealistic (some would say naïve) ideas seriously. The universalist concepts of co-operation and friendly competition that are trumpeted in the Olympic Games have little resonance in a lexicon based on jihad and hatred.

For Israelis, while the concept of an Olympic truce might have been embraced with hope at one time, almost four years of Palestinian terror attacks have destroyed such optimism, at least for the short term. On many occasions, we listened to Palestinian rhetoric about a possible "ceasefire" (a surrealistic term in a war conducted by suicide bombers), and there were a number of rounds of negotiations and even some paper agreements with American officials, but Arafat's war continued without pause.

In their internal discussions, Palestinian factions spoke about a "hudna" – a temporary halt in the fighting until they could restock and rebuild for the next round. And in his speeches, Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, recalled the Hudibiyya precedent, found in the Qur'an, in which Mohammed followed precisely this strategy while his forces were still relatively weak. Given this background, proposals for an Olympic truce – unsupervised and unenforced – are unlikely to be taken seriously in Israel, knowing that it will probably be used to prepare for the next and expanded round of violence and murder.

But instead of dismissing the idea, the idealism and hope that it reflects can be channelled into a more useful and realistic approach. The terrorist campaigns and ethno-national wars from the jungles of South America to Pakistan and North Korea are built on foundations of incitement and hatred. In the Palestinian context, as Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch, has documented, this venomous incitement includes sermons delivered in mosques, as well as television shows and music directed at children that glorify "martyrdom" and demonize Israelis and Jews. Such propaganda is also common in Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries, and includes productions of the notorious anti-Semitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

In this context, an Olympic truce aimed at halting such poison and lethal propaganda for at least 16 days would be major accomplishment. Indeed, this is a goal that Papandreou – who made a tremendous contribution to historic reconciliation between Greece and Turkey – along with the other members of the Olympic truce movement, should embrace. If political officials, journalists and religious leaders can be persuaded to stop the rhetoric of hatred for this period, it would provide an important and optimistic path for the future. And, going further, this Olympic truce could include support for positive messages of acceptance and co-operation.

This proposal is, admittedly, wildly optimistic, but if we are already indulging ourselves in naïve ideas, this one is at least worth a try.

If Palestinian and Israeli children and their parents see images of mutual tolerance instead of the steady diet of demonization, even for 16 days, it might give some people pause before returning to the pro-jihad jingles and recruiting songs for child suicide bombers when the truce ends.

The Kirshner File

Gaza withdrawal plan has been launched

The recent decision by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's cabinet to sanction in theory a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank – Israel's most important diplomatic initiative since Sharon won office in 2001 – could be a historic turning point.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

By agreeing in principle to evacuate Gaza, captured in the 1967 Six Day War, the government belatedly recognized that Israel's security interests are not necessarily synonymous with the retention of territories heavily populated by Palestinian Arabs. But the momentous decision, taken on the 22nd anniversary of Israel's ill-fated invasion of Lebanon, did not quite meet Sharon's expectations. He had hoped to make a clean, irrevocable break with Gaza, home to 1.3 million Palestinians and 7,500 Jewish settlers.

Sharon sought an unambiguous vote of confidence for his disengagement plan, which calls for the evacuation of all 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the northern West Bank. But he quickly learned he had underestimated his opponents yet again. What he got instead was a bland, noncommital undertaking to review the issue in about eight months. He should have known better. On May 2, the Likud party's central committee rejected his original proposal, thereby demonstrating its aversion to the idea of territorial compromise.

Undeterred by Likud's recalcitrance, Sharon pushed ahead, unveiling a scenario under which the settlements in Gaza and the West Bank would be removed in four distinct stages, subject to strict cabinet approval. First to go in Gaza would be Netzarim, Morag and Kfar Darom, followed by the West Bank outposts of Homesh, Ganim, Kadim and Sanur. During the third and fourth phases, the Gush Katif bloc and three settlements in the northern Gaza – Dugit, Alie Sinai and Nissanit – would be relinquished

Sharon's plan initially failed to impress four influential ministers: Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, Education Minister Limor Livnat and Agriculture Minister Yisrael Katz. Being one vote short of a majority, Sharon had no alternative but to water down his plan and wait another week before taking it to the cabinet on June 6.

Even then, Sharon faced a major hurdle. Two far-right parties in his coalition government, the National Union and the National Religious Party, both of which virtually equate territorial concessions with treason, balked. Having threatened to fire unco-operative ministers, Sharon made good on his promise by firing Transportation Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Tourism Minister Benny Elon of the National Union, the most extreme party in the coalition.

These dismissals, though, had no discernible effect on ministers deadset against withdrawals. Like the settlers, they claimed that vacating Gaza would be tantamount to rewarding Palestinian terrorism. Their rationale was disingenuous, given their ideological desire to retain the territories at all costs. Cognizant of their unwavering views, and amenable to a compromise solution brokered by the minister-without-portfolio, Tzipi Livni, Sharon presented a diluted version of his plan that, essentially, postpones a final reckoning.

The pivotal principle of withdrawal has thus been enshrined, but the cabinet will not discuss an actual pullout again until next February. In the interval, Sharon can prepare the logistics of the mooted withdrawals and build domestic and international support for them. By opting for a compromise, he saved himself the trouble of cobbling together a new cabinet, dissolving the government or calling fresh elections.

Ariel Sharon

Rightly or wrongly, Sharon is confident his plan will eventually become official policy. "By the end of 2005, there will not be one Jew remaining in the Gaza Strip," he declared. Sharon's definitive remark led to the resignations of two hardline ministers, Effi Eitam and Yitzhak Levy, last week.

Sharon's determination to see his plan through – U.S. President George W. Bush has described it as "a courageous and historic step"– stems from a belief that, for political, military, economic and demographic reasons, Israel has no compelling reason to stay in Gaza any longer than is absolutely necessary.

His willingness to relinquish Gaza is directly related to his calculation that, in return, he can maintain a firm grip on settlement clusters in the West Bank. Two months ago, in a groundbreaking letter to Sharon, Bush conferred U.S. legitimacy on Sharon's long-term strategic objective. But Washington's support – which has been denounced by Palestinians and in the Arab world – hinges on a full Israeli pullout from Gaza, as Bush's national security advisor, Condoleeza Rice, said recently.

Although Eitam, the former housing minister, lambasted Sharon's proposed withdrawal as "one of the darkest and most terrible decisions" in Israel's history, six out of 10 Israelis appear to back the plan, and Eitam's sentiments are the preserve of a zealous minority basically out of touch with realities.

Sharon – the architect of the Gaza settlements and the man who once said that "every settlement is critical for our defence" – knows the country is behind him and is weary of the violence that has consumed Israel since the eruption of the intifadah nearly four years ago.

Israelis have shown resilience in the face of suicide bombings and roadside attacks. Yet the fighting, which has claimed the lives of nearly 1,000 Israelis and many more Palestinians, has battered the economy, blackened Israel's image abroad and elicited demands for fundamental change. Most Israelis perceive Gaza as a burden to be jettisoned and Sharon's plan as a pathway to a possible resumption of talks with the Palestinians.

Last month, 150,000 Israelis gathered in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square to support the concept of a withdrawal from Gaza. One can safely assume that some of the protesters prefer a negotiated withdrawal to a unilateral pullout as the smartest way of disengaging from the Palestinians in Gaza. Sharon prefers a unilateral approach because he does not regard Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat as a credible or reliable partner.

For Sharon, a withdrawal from Gaza is also crucial because, if the status quo prevails, Israel may be forced to cede far more territory in the West Bank should an international consensus on the issue materialize. And on a purely visceral level, Israelis want to get out of Gaza because it is like southern Lebanon prior to May 2000 – a deathtrap for Israeli troops. Last month, within the space of a few days, 13 soldiers were killed in three separate ambushes in Gaza. In the aftermath of the first incident, Palestinian gunmen ghoulishly displayed the body parts of some of the victims.

The jolting death toll, as well as the morbid exhibitionism of the Palestinians flaunting the remains, was eerily reminiscent of a seminal 1997 ambush in Lebanon in which 12 Israeli commandos were killed in a single ambush and their body parts gleefully brandished in front of reporters.

In response to its most recent casualties in Gaza, Israel launched Operation Rainbow. Lasting six days and touching off two smaller incursions, it was Israel's biggest armoured thrust into Gaza since the 1967 Six Day War. Apart from the obvious element of revenge, the broad purpose of Operation Rainbow was threefold: to uncover arms-smuggling tunnels, demolish buildings Palestinian guerrillas had used as cover when firing on Israeli soldiers and restore the deterrent power of the Israeli army.

More to the point, Israel unleashed Operation Rainbow after learning that a large delivery of Katyushas, anti-tank rockets, rocket-propelled grenades and perhaps even shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles – a strategic threat to Israeli commercial aircraft – were to be smuggled into Rafah from Egypt via tunnels. Since the start of the Palestinian uprising, Israel has found some 90 tunnels. The Palestinians began building them after discovering they could not smuggle weapons past the well-guarded security fence encircling Gaza.

In concrete terms, Israel's accomplishments in Operation Rainbow – which caused the deaths of more than 40 Palestinians and aroused widespread condemnation – were apparently quite modest. Israel destroyed only two tunnels, but left the telling impression that more punishing raids can be expected if Palestinian terrorism flares up after an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza.

To forestall that possibility, Israel intends to adopt a variety of measures – from widening the so-called Philadelphia road between Gaza and Egypt to maintaining control over border passages into Gaza.

At Israel's request, Egypt has all but agreed to train a Palestinian security force and deploy forces along its frontier with Gaza. More importantly, Egypt has reportedly promised to staunch the flow of weapons and munitions into Gaza.

Terrorists may indeed try to wreak havoc on Israel after its withdrawal from Gaza. But if that happens, Israel will occupy the high moral ground and will be at complete liberty to retaliate without worrying about the political fallout.

A guided tour of evolution

Evolution* by Edward J. Larson, Random House, $29.95.

In the 16th century, Copernicus and Galileo moved the Earth from the centre of the solar system. By so doing, they invoked the wrath of the Church, because they had removed man from the centre of the universe.

Darwinism, in the 19th century, seemed even worse. Evolution not only denied the literal interpretation of Genesis, it also questioned the uniqueness of man.

Darwin's 1859 Origin of Species remains the most controversial book in scientific history. Even if the Church would not burn him, it could not ignore him.

Books

Bernard Baskin

On reading the book, the wife of the Bishop of Worcester had appealed to heaven: "Let us hope it is not true, but if it is, let us pray that it does not become generally known!" The good lady's pious plea was not answered. The battles started within months of the book's publication.

The anti-evolutionists argued that man is too important to have been a chance descendant of a one-celled ancestor – he could only have been personally created by God. The objections to evolution were also predicated on the existence of an entity called the soul, which is presumed to be man's unique possession.

Despite challenges – and even differences among scientists about technical aspects of evolution – the theory is now one of the pillars of modern science.

However, half the population of the United States remains unconvinced of the validity of the theory of evolution.

Religious fundamentalists litigate for the right to teach "Creation Science" alongside evolution in U.S. public schools.

And recently, President George W. Bush stated his belief that the jury is still out on evolution.

Some religionists have found a way to reconcile their faith with evolution, by making God the initiator and guide of the entire process of evolution.

Recently, Carl Feit, an Orthodox rabbi and professor of health sciences at Yeshiva University, came to the conclusion that "after 100 years of the most intense analysis, debate and critical testing, the theory of evolution still stands as the central pillar of modern biology. It provides a way of explaining and predicting scientific results as any good theory should, with thousands of facts as its empirical base."

Feit believes that as Creator, God is acting more like a sculptor than a carpenter. Detail is drawn out of chaos in a continuous process of refinement, making finer and finer distinctions. "From this perspective, there is no longer any conflict between the biblical account of creation and the evolutionary theory."

An earlier thinker who accepted evolution was the British chief rabbi, Dr. J. H. Hertz (1872-1946). He argued that in the face of the great diversity of views among earlier Jewish teachers on how the creation narrative in Genesis is to be interpreted, there is inherently nothing un-Jewish in the evolutionary view of the origin and growth of forms of existence from the simple to the complex and from the lowest to the highest.

Jean Baptiste de Lamarck, a respected French scientist (1744-1829), believed, as did many, in the inheritance of acquired characteristics. Consider giraffes: De Lamarck would say that the evolution of the giraffe's long neck was due to the striving of each individual giraffe to reach the leaves on the trees. The efforts of a given giraffe led to a lengthening of its neck, and this acquired characteristic was passed on to its offspring.

Darwin's explanation is completely different. He held that in every generation of giraffes there were those that had longer necks than average because they were genetically favoured in this respect. Since they had a better chance to feed well on the trees, over the generations, the longer-necked giraffes survived better and passed on their favourable genes to the next generation.

In his lively work, Evolution, Edward J. Larson takes the reader on a guided tour of evolution, from its theoretical antecedents in the early 19th century to the brilliant breakthroughs of Darwin and Wallace, and from the stunning discovery of the DNA double helix to the rise of socio-biology today.

This is a rich, readable and compelling work.

An immigrant's diary

By VIVI GORDON

Guest Voice

I will never forget the day I came to Canada, arriving at the airport with two big suitcases and a fast-beating heart, looking forward to the beginning of a completely new life.

I got here with a heart full of expectations, illusions and goals. And, of course, fear, due to the uncertainty of the future.

I will never forget that day, March 17, 2004, when I became a landed immigrant, a day I had dreamed of for such a long time.

A million ideas crossed my mind while I pondered the direction I should follow. I had tasks to accomplish, including finding a place to live and getting a job, as well as making friends.

Right now, my main concern is obtaining a job. Whenever I look at my bank account and realize how fast it is getting closer to zero, I panic.

As soon as I arrived, I started looking for a job. I went to various agencies whose aim is to help new immigrants get settled and established in Canada.

I was given an enormous amount of information – the information available can become overwhelming – and I was given the opportunity to attend numerous workshops to learn how to write a resumé, how to handle job interviews and how to network.

One of the most frequent suggestions I was given was that I should volunteer. By volunteering, I would kill two birds with one stone: I would gain the much-needed "Canadian experience" and I would meet people related to my profession.

Some organizations offered me a two- or three-week-long job-hunting workshop. I was told that after finishing it they would place me in a full-time volunteer position in my field for three or four months so that I could obtain Canadian experience.

However, these organizations did not guarantee that a volunteer position would eventually lead to a paid job. Whenever I asked them how was I supposed to support myself in the meantime, I would receive a reply such as "I see your point..." and nothing more.

Nevertheless, I am now volunteering for an organization twice a week. I am very happy with this opportunity because I greatly enjoy my job, I am frequently learning new tasks and I meet interesting people.

People at the agencies helping me with job-hunting say that networking – trying to increase the circle of people you meet – improves your chances of finding a job. For that reason, I am working on expanding my contacts and getting to know as many people as possible.

I have volunteered at the Jewish Film Festival and I have made commitments to at least three other events, as volunteering is an excellent way to get involved in the community and meet people.

Even though volunteering and networking are the most valuable tools in obtaining a job, I am using other strategies, as well.

For example, I check Internet websites on which jobs are posted and I have distributed my resumé to shops and restaurants.

However, the question of how I am going to finance myself and pay my bills remains unanswered.

The process of getting established takes quite a long time and I am still coping with many aspects of it. I hope that my sharing this story gives you a glimpse of the difficulties immigrants face during their first months in Canada.

Canada is a labyrinth of possibilities for me. The opportunities exist; I know they do. However, reaching those opportunities seems to be as hard as finding the way out of the maze. I keep knocking on doors, but none has fully opened yet.

Nevertheless, I do not lose hope that one will open soon, very soon.

Vivi Gordon is a newly landed immigrant to Canada.

Jewish Net rumours and hoaxes

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Did you just get an e-mail about that company that boycotts Israel? Or did someone message you about what that anti-Semitic actor said? Or did you hear about that politician who trivialized the Holocaust?

Actually, those events may never have happened. You may be on the receiving end of an Internet hoax.

I regularly get e-mails warning me not to patronize a certain multinational corporation because it has just adopted some odious policy toward Israel. After a bit of investigating, I usually find that the rumour is just that – a rumour. Aside from wasting someone's time to check out the e-mail, the sender is maligning an innocent organization or individual. Israel and world Jewry have enough real enemies without adding guiltless names to the list. So this week and next, I'll tell you where to look to check out whether an accusation really is true – or merely unsubstantiated lashon hara.

Of course Internet hoaxes are not solely a Jewish phenomenon. However, a disproportionate number of rumours making the circuit do seem to have Jewish or Israeli themes. For example, one repellent e-mail tells of an ad campaign for Nike shoes that shows an apparent suicide bombing in Israel. The text of the ad next to Nike's trademarked Swoosh reads, "You may not survive the blast. But your shoes will." The Anti-Defamation League has an entire section on its website geared to debunking rumours and calls the e-mail a forgery. Nike says it "was not authorized by Nike and has no affiliation with the company." [www.adl.org/Internet_Rumors/]

How can you spot a hoax in your e-mail inbox? Urban Legends at About.com says there's no foolproof way to tell, but it has a few tips:

- Look for the phrase, "Forward this to everyone you know!" The more urgent the plea, the more suspect the message.
- Look for statements like "This is NOT a hoax." They typically mean the opposite of what they say.
- Watch for overly emphatic language, as well as frequent use of UPPERCASE LETTERS and multiple exclamation points!!!!!!! [http://urbanlegends.about.com/msubabt.htm]

In addition to ADL and Urban Legends.about.com, here are some other debunking websites to visit. Search them for the words "Israel" or "Jewish" and you'll find the rumours they've investigated. TruthOrFiction debunks accusation that the Marriott hotel chain classifies portion of Jerusalem as "Occupied Palestinian Area." Marriott did send out letters with that phrase because of a mailing list it had received and has since corrected the error. [www.truthorfiction.com] The Snopes site tackles the infamous report that 4,000 Jews stayed home from work at the World Trade Center on 9/11. [www.snopes.com]

Hoaxbusters is particularly interesting because it is run by the U.S. government's Department of Energy. One piece of advice: if in doubt, do not forward that suspect e-mail to friends and colleagues. Most hoaxers want nothing more than to gum up the Internet with worthless messages and warnings. [http://hoaxbusters.ciac.org/] For more truth and rumours, take a look at BoycottWatch. [www.boycottwatch.org]

Of course, not all urban legends are pernicious. Here's one apocryphal story that actually predates the Internet but has been given new life by the Web. [www.snopes.com/college/exam/trickanswer.asp] The story goes that a wise but unworldly Harvard professor was known for asking the same question on every final exam: "Who, in chronological order, were the Kings of Israel?" Students counted on the question and were never disappointed. Except for the year the professor decided to change the question to: "Who were the Major Prophets and who were the Minor Prophets?" The baffled students handed in their papers without even attempting the question, except for one inspired student who wrote the following: "Far be it from me to distinguish between these revered gentlemen, but it occurred to me that you might like to have a chronological list of the Kings of Israel."

Fact or fiction? You decide.

I am about to start preparing my semi-annual column about your favourite Jewish and Israeli websites. If you've created a site you're proud of or find yourself visiting one over and over again, tell me about it at the address below. I'll mention the best this summer.

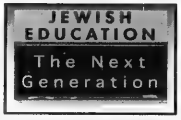
The goal of education? Ask the kids

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In a recent piece collected in Visions of Jewish Education, Moshe Greenberg, professor emeritus of Bible at Hebrew University, discusses what he sees as the core mandate of current Jewish pedagogy. Greenberg writes of "the learner as a creature impelled by curiosity concerning the world around him and his own inner life… When a particular culture is capable of providing its members with appropriate spiritual satisfaction, it will also persist over time."



Schools and their entourages – administrators, teachers, boards, parents, federations – wrestle endlessly with the magic formulae that will satisfy all constituents and provide the children with that most slippery of accomplishments – "a good Jewish education." Often the people who are least heeded, and yet the most worth listening to, are the students themselves. What will serve them? Will they turn out the way we would envision?

Greenberg alludes to the fact that in the discussion about what to teach and how to teach it, the principle component must always be the spiritual potential of each child. To those who argue that the goal of a Jewish school should be to empower children to master classical texts, or to make them conversant with the richness of Jewish history and culture, or to become fluent in the Hebrew language, or to become habituated to Jewish practices, I respectfully demur.

Ultimately, all of the above are surely important components of a well-rounded student, but the first goal of our contemporary efforts in any Jewish classroom must be inspiration on the existential level, and an anticipation of that most central of student questions: Why should I care? Or, put another way: What does Judaism mean to me? How can I make it my own? In what way does it speak to my situation, my aspirations, hopes, anxieties, desires, feelings, fears, frustrations?

The common wisdom is that such questions, in the post-enlightenment melée, belong to the province of the more secular student who needs to be prodded and cajoled as to the worth of Jewish values and traditions. A false assumption if there ever was one. The reality is that this quest for meaning and relevance is true of students of every denominational stripe and communal affiliation, from the tenacious atheist to the haredi learner. As a rule, questions not asked do not represent questions never contemplated. What this silence probably suggests is that the student has unerringly sniffed out an educational atmosphere where questions are not tolerated, and are even discouraged, out of ideology or ignorance. Such intolerance has no particular address – the dogma of those who see divine revelation at Sinai as the domain of unsophisticated fundamentalism is a mirror image of the, at times, unnecessary rigidity of the worldview it mocks.

Children are not geese. We cannot stuff them with Jewish facts and details as though all this will metamorphosize into a paté de fois gras of Jewish spirituality and menschlichkeit. At our peril do we delude ourselves that the desire to know why Judaism matters applies only to those without "sufficient background" or those who are not religiously observant. If you don't believe me, take the acid test – talk to the kids.

Reform rabbis set to meet in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

About 500 Reform rabbis from North America, Israel and Europe are expected in Toronto for the 115th annual convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), the Reform rabbinic umbrella.

The meeting, scheduled to take place at the Westin Harbour Castle from June 20 to 23, has a wide-ranging agenda, with topics ranging from terrorism to transgender issues and from physician-assisted suicide to the Zohar – the central text in Kabbalah.

A major evening session will be devoted to the Reform movement in Israel, and a subsequent session will focus on connection between American and Israeli Jews.

The final session features Lutheran theologian Martin Marty, who will discuss "The Religious Landscape in North America Today."

"From the areas we're covering, you can see that Reform Judaism very much responds to the needs of the modern Jew on every level, and that it strives to be inclusive and to bring people in and make them comfortable within our fold," said Rabbi Paul Menitoff, executive vice-president of the CCAR, from his New York office.

The organization, founded in 1889, counts 38 rabbis in Canada among its 1,800 members. There are 12 Reform congregations in Israel.

Among the most pressing issues facing Reform rabbis today, said Rabbi Menitoff, is "helping our people respond to the challenge of living with their feet in two different worlds – coping with the challenge of being serious Jews and serious citizens of the western world at the same time.

"That plays out on a lot of levels. There's certainly a clash of values… Religions are challenged – and certainly Judaism is challenged – to help people find meaning in their lives."

A related issue to be addressed at the convention is "New Thinking about Adolescent Programs in Congregations."

The adolescent years represent "one of the times when Judaism has an opportunity to make a difference in the lives of young people," said Rabbi Menitoff, "and if we interface in a significant way when they're going through adolescence, that will stay with them and increase the probability they'll continue to take their Judaism seriously, or will motivate them to take it seriously."

In the past three decades, the CCAR convention has been held in Canada at least three times – twice in Toronto and once in Montreal, he said.

Pearl clan to break bread at family reunion

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Making bread is a Pearl family tradition and this month they gather from far and wide to celebrate their heritage.

With 150 registered for the Toronto event, the reunion unites three generations of Jewish descendants, all linked to Lebish (Louis) Perel and his wife Malka (Molly) Grinblat.

"We felt it was time for our children and our children's children to get together and meet each other," said Sidney Chelsky, Lebish and Malka's grandson.

As one of six family members responsible for organizing the weekend-long affair that takes place from June 18 to 20, Chelsky said the reunion marks the first time since 1994 that the Pearls have formally united to recognize their ancestry.

Chelsky said the majority of his relatives are based in Toronto, but others will arrive from across Ontario, Montreal, Oregon, Ohio, California, Florida, Israel and China.

While distance may have separated the members of the Pearl family tree, its branches link back to south-central Poland and the small town of Lagov, where Lebish and Malka established themselves in 1895.

After years of prominence in Lagov, the couple and their children immigrated to Canada in the late 1920s. In Toronto, Lebish was translated to Louis, Perel to Pearl and baking to success, Chelsky said.

"Lebish and Malka had become bakers in Lagov and so became bakers in Canada. They were loved for their kindness, caring and generosity, not to mention their bread.

"When Lebish left Lagov, the town, Jews and Gentiles, petitioned him to return, but to no avail. His heart and family had become quickly attached to their new home in this new world."

Involved with a number of Toronto bakeries at different points in their careers, the Pearls have, at various times, set up shop on Kensington Ave., College St. and Augusta Ave.

Chelsky said he had an early start in the family business, working at the Augusta bakery counter when he was nine years old.

The Pearls have also been involved with Health Bread — now owned by Open Window Bakery — and Gryfe's Bagel Bakery, Chelsky said. Several of the young bakers that apprenticed at Pearl's Bakery went on to run bakeries of their own, including Harbord Bakery and Bregman's Bakery and Restaurant.

Aside from having an impact on Toronto's bread lovers, Chelsky said the Pearls have helped influence Canadian constitutional history.

"With a bit of pride, we can say that, going back to the 1930s and '40s, the early family bakeries attempted to be shomer Shabbat and ran afoul of the Sunday-closing laws," he said.

The Pearls' experience with the laws had an effect on the Ontario Court of Appeal decision that, in the '90s, struck them down as a denial of religious freedom, said Chelsky.

And aside from making history, the Pearls have generously supported charitable organizations here and in Israel, including Hadassah, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, UJA Federation and Ben Gurion University. They have also helped Israeli soldiers with disabilities and and children with mental disabilities, Chelsky said.

Pearl Family at Pesach in 1925

"My mother taught us tzedakah at an early age. We would come home from school and she would be feeding poor people at our kitchen table," he said.

While bread is "the acknowledged family heart," Chelsky said the Pearls have gone into a variety of professional fields.

"We've got our lawyers and doctors, engineers and financial gurus, educators and techies, accountants, interior designers, would-be-politicians, philanthropists and a few who haven't been so lucky.

"Some of us own businesses like laundries, construction, flooring, office services, and yes, one even runs a bakery."

Chelsky said he is now a laundry consultant. His son, Brian, has taken over Chelsky's business, Careful Hand Laundry and Dry Cleaners, which has operated for 75 years.

The opportunity to pass down family businesses has been easy for the Pearls. Lebish and Malka were blessed with 172 children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and great-great-grandchildren, he said.

"You can do a lot in a hundred years!"

The oldest family member attending the reunion is Lillian Salsberg, 90, of Toronto. The youngest? "If you count what's in the oven," said Chelsky, laughing, adding that his grandson Benjamin Chelsky, 2, will be there.

The weekend includes family dinners on Friday and Saturday nights and a luncheon on Sunday at Baycrest Terrace. A slideshow of pictures dating back to the days in Poland will be shown on Sunday. As well, a book and CD-ROM-format of family recollections, produced by a Pearl family member, will be presented at the luncheon.

Because "Making Bread" is the reunion's theme, Chelsky said Open Window Bakery has donated shellacked loaves of bread to be used as table centrepieces and Robin Hood Flour has contributed bakers' caps.

March of the Living

In Toronto, meanwhile, Machlis' itinerary was packed with meetings with Canadian Christian leaders, including Rev. Malcolm Hedding, executive director of the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem (ICEJ); Karen Hamilton, general secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches; Barbara McKercher, secretary of the Christian Jewish Dialogue of Toronto (CJDT); and Cynthia Scott, chair the CJDT, and Rev. Walter Kelly, Toronto representative of Bridges for Peace.

ICEJ spokesperson Donna Holbrook said the program outlined by Machlis is intriguing, but it is too early to say whether ICEJ will participate in it. ICEJ has requested more information and "we'll distribute the material to the [group's 75] branch directors in the world."

Participating in March of the Living might reduce the number of people who visit Israel for the Feast of Tabernacles, she said, noting that last fall ICEJ brought 4,000 people to Israel for the Christian festival and injected an estimated $10 million into the Jerusalem economy.

Holbrook said she was "keen" on the March of the Living proposal. "I would very seriously look at the whole package and present it to our members."

Machlis said groups will be expected to fund the trips themselves, but subsidies are available when needed. March of the Living receives a "substantial" contribution each year from the Claims Conference, but it will have to fundraise to reach its projected 2005 budget of around $28 million (US), he said.

JAFI prepares for increase in aliyah from France

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Two of Toronto's top Jewish lay-leaders recently returned from a special fact-finding mission to Paris where they met with Jewish officials and community members to learn more about escalating French antisemitsm as well as the growing interest in aliyah.

"I found the trip troubling," says UJA Federation chair Leslie Gales. "I'm sorry to say that the situation in France is not good. Without a doubt, the French community has been hit by a serious mood change over the past several years. Today, antisemitism prevails and there is no suggestion that this bias is about to change anytime soon."

The three-day trip highlighted the role of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), which has expanded significantly lately.

"The Jewish Agency has reacted by supplementing their ordinary aliyah personnel with a crew of experienced representatives who come on a rotating basis for a couple of weeks and are stationed in the suburbs where interest in aliyah is the highest," said UIA Federations Canada president, Shoel Silver. "JAFI has also recruited French 'antennae' – people in smaller communities who become aware of individuals thinking about aliyah."

Jewish high school students from France enjoy a recent trip to Israel. The trip was a pilot project for potential new olim.

Based on a 2002 survey – just as the wave of antisemitic attacks on French Jews had begun – aliyah from France has doubled in the past 15 years. The survey revealed that six percent of French Jews would be making aliyah "very soon", double the percentage of the last survey in 1988. That number increased to 12 percent among families with school-aged children, and 28 percent among families with children attending Jewish schools.

"As a Canadian Jew I am proud that the Jewish Agency has kept aliyah as their main focus," says Gales. "More and more young Jewish families of France – with fear in their eyes and worry in their hearts – are ready and willing to change their lives because there is no Jewish future in France. "

"Clearly, aliyah, or at least departure from France, is an option being considered by more and more people," says Silver. "It also became apparent from several of our meetings that the organized community recognizes that aliyah is on the agenda, not as the solution for all, but an opportunity for those who wish to consider this option. This, in essence, captures the unique role of JAFI in supporting global Jewry."

The Toronto mission contingent – comprised of Leslie Gales and Shoel Silver – was invited to join JAFI board chair Carole Solomon, along with Josh Schwarcz, JAFI's secretary general, and Zeev Bielski, Mayor of Raanana.

Nurturing Jewish artists

The Toronto Jewish Arts Council of UJA Federation recently held the first in a series of panel discussions to help Jewish artists learn about available grants. Pictured (l-r) are: Colette Naubert, Andrew Gann, Sanjay Shahani, Beth Reynolds, Lisa Nabieszko and Cyrel Troster, Chair of the Cultural Services and Planning Committee. The audience consisted of 65 artists from every discipline. The discussion was organized by Cheryl Landy, UJA's cultural services coordinator.

Israeli performers transcend physical limitations

For the first time in its history, a very special troupe of entertainers will be performing outside of Israel this week:, as they take to the stage at Toronto's Bathurst Street Theatre.

The theatrical group, known as Nalaga'at (Do Touch) - comprised of 12 Israeli actors, most of whom are deaf and blind or partially so - will be in town on June 17, to perform their popular play, "Light Heard in Zig-Zag." Toronto is the first stop on their North American tour.

More than 1,000 deaf-blind people live in Israel today. Most of them suffer from Usher Syndrome, which begins with congenital deafness and tunnel vision that develops over the years, progressively restricting the visual field until total blindness.

Besides being powerful and entertaining, Nalaga'at is an example of how Israeli culture is increasingly considering the contribution of deaf-blind people to society.

A scene from the Israeli hit play, "Light is heard in Zig-Zag"

"Light is Heard in Zig Zag," which has won acclaim throughout Israel, is an inspiring pantomime performance that dramatizes the performers' dreams versus their reality.

"Before I got involved with Nalaga'at, I didn't know any deaf or blind people," says Adina Tal, director, writer, actress and artistic director of the organization. "I began to work with the group four years ago and I absolutely fell in love with all of them. They amaze me every day, it's like being on an unbelievable journey, like discovering a new world, and there are no limits to what people can do in that world. The play makes people laugh and cry, and soon you forget that the actors don't see or hear. "

Through their performances, Nalaga'at, a non-profit organization, hopes to establish a center that will provide early detection of Usher Syndrome and prepare sufferers for independent life as blind people.

One person who will be at the performance is Natalie Schonfeld, a Toronto photographer who came here from her native Venezuela 13 years ago. Schonfeld was recently awarded a $5,000 visual arts grant from UJA Federation's Toronto Jewish Arts council.

Schonfeld, who has been documenting through photography, the personal realities and perceptions of individuals who are deaf or blind across Canada for the past seven years, saw her work culminate with her first book, Perceptions of Light – Canada, published last summer. Schonfeld will be photographing Nalaga'at rehearsals and performances.

"My body of work shows the positive aspects of people's lives; it's about the human being and his environment, and the way they interact. For me, photography is a visual method of communication, and I've always been interested in non-verbal communication. I'm excited to photograph Nalaga'at to see how they've been able to get across their artistic expression despite their limited verbal and hearing skills."

Tomorrow Campaign a boost for the city, says David Miller

Toronto mayor addresses UJA annual meeting

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

According to Toronto Mayor David Miller, UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign will help to transform the entire city.

Miller described the Tomorrow Campaign as "hugely important" to the city of Toronto. "It is the single biggest community development project in Canada, and I feel privileged that Toronto is the beneficiary of this outstanding outpouring of generosity and community spirit."

Mayor Miller made his comments at UJA Federation's recent Annual General Meeting at the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, where he stayed to talk with participants long after the formal proceedings ended.

The $250 million Tomorrow Campaign, launched on May 7, is UJA Federation's most ambitious initiative ever. It is the largest, not-for-profit Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history, which will fund facilities, programs and services in three sections of the GTA – the Downtown District, Central Square in the Bathurst-Sheppard area, and City North, which will be built on a 50-acre tract of York Region land.

"This initiative is a tremendous boost for Toronto and the GTA," said Miller. "It is an important part of an even larger project, which is nothing less than the transformation of the entire city. Things are changing in Toronto, and they're changing in huge and marvelous ways."

Shem Tov Award winners: (l-r) Charles Novogrodsky, Rena Markus & Talia Samson accepting on behalf of their fater, Marshall Kesten; Susan Friedrich, Bernard Fishbein and Nathan Disenhouse.

"It was wonderful to hear Mayor Miller speak of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign as a key element in the renaissance of Toronto and as model for city building," said UJA Federation president, Ted Sokolsky.

"This has been a landmark year for UJA Federation," said the organization's chair of the board, Leslie Gales. "It was one of our community's most momentous, ambitious, and historic ever. Campaign 2004 raised a resounding $58 million for both core community needs and extraordinary needs facing Israel and the Jewish world. Now we're about to embark on Campaign 2005, to build a secure Jewish future for our children. Our campaign will pay particular attention to four key areas – community protection, strengthening our Jewish voice, Israel's special needs and linking Jewish youth to Jewish life."

Mayor Miller also reiterated that hate crimes are not welcome in Toronto.

"A few months ago, when there was a series of hate-motivated crimes in Toronto, the people of our city rallied together with one voice. Torontonians of every religion, race and culture recognized that an attack against one group is an attack against all of us. It is important that we remain vigilant on a day-to-day basis. We must always be watchful, so that acts of hate do not creep back in to our communities."

Carole Solomon, Chair of the Board of Governors, Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, warned about how vulnerable one of Israel's greatest assets has become.

"The Jewish Agency has given Israel its most important resource, it's people, an amazing amount of human capital," said Solomon referring to JAFI's role in helping Jews around the world make aliyah. "That capital is at risk today. New immigrants are the vulnerable of the vulnerable. Unemployment among new olim is more than double than that of the general population."

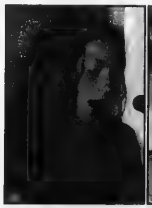
Leslie Gales, Chair, UJA Federation and Toronto mayor David Miller.

Ontario students ponder the power of one

For the first time in 10 years, a student from an Ontario Catholic high school captured first place in the annual arts/writing contest sponsored by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

The theme of this year's contest - made possible through the generosity and support of Brenda Fishauf – was making a positive impact on today's society.

More than 100 students from junior high schools and high schools across Ontario mailed in their artistic expressions on the Holocaust. Entries ranged from essays, stories and poems, to plays and artwork. Students were asked to relate the quote: "Can I make a difference? The Power of One" to both the Holocaust and contemporary society.



Laura Pellow

Prerna Kumar

Prerna Kumar, a grade 11 student at Ascension of our Lord Catholic School captured the senior honour while Laura Pellow, a grade 8 student from Richmond Hill's United Synagogue Day School campus, took first place in the junior division.

Prerna Kumar's winning entry.

"My piece of artwork was a collage of many squares, each of different shades of blue watercolours," says Pellow. "Each square represented a different person, and its height represented its status in society. I did not give a title to my piece of artwork, but if I would have, I would've named it "The Staircase to Freedom," because just as a staircase has many steps to get from one height to another, so does the process of influencing others and eventually taking action. There are many steps along the way to freedom, and I believe that it all starts with an idea."

For finishing first, Laura and Prerna won a trip to visit the US Holocaust Museum in Washington where they will be accompanied by Lorraine Sandler, Chair of the Holocaust Education Committee.

"I am very excited to go to Washington to the Holocaust Centre," says Pellow. "I have two grandparents who are Holocaust survivors, so it will truly be an extraordinary experience for me."

Community honours volunteers

UJA Federation recently honoured some of the community's most distinguished volunteers at its Annual General Meeting. Here is a summary of the award winners.

Shem Tov Award

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

- Alan Dessau, Circle of Care
- Nathan Disenhouse, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa
- Bernard Fishbein, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre
- Susan Friedrich, Kehilla Residential Programme
- Marshall Kesten, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education
- Charles Novogrodsky, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre

Leadership Development Awards

Leadership Development Awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

- Natan Aronshtam: Committed to improving life for newcomers to Toronto.
- David Spiro: A UJA Federation young leadership volunteer for several years.

Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence:

Named after the late Jewish community leader Phil Granovsky, this award is a tribute to individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning.

This year's winner is Donald Bennett, who, for nearly 25 years, has been actively involved in Toronto's Jewish community, demonstrating outstanding leadership in a variety of roles.

Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) Award of Excellence:

This Award of Excellence recognizes professionals in the Jewish community whose outstanding long-term contributions benefit the Foundation, lawyers, accountants, estate planners, and charitable organizations.

Wolfe D. Goodman, Q.C. is the first recipient of the Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence.

He was instrumental in helping to create the infrastructure that enables the Foundation to offer services to so many individuals, families and professionals.

Reena fundraiser to aid new elderhome

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When David and Luba Smuschkowitz were asked to be the honorees at the Reena Foundation Gala, to be held June 24, they did something completely out of character – they accepted.

David and Luba Smuschkowitz will be honoured by Reena on June 24.

As committed philanthropists and volunteers in the Jewish community, they had in the past been asked by several organizations to be their honorees, but they always declined.

Smuschkowitz said that "this time, we agreed to accept, because it is an opportunity to help out the most [vulnerable] in our community."

Money raised at the gala will go toward building a second Reena elderhome. The Al and Faye Mintz Reena Elderhome, which opened in Thornhill in 2001 and is the first of its kind in Canada, can house up to 15 residents over age 55.

David Smuschkowitz, 80, the owner of Steele Valley Developments Limited, is a founder of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto (UJA Federation), an officer of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, and a longtime member of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where he and Luba donated the library in memory of their parents.

David was also instrumental in the construction of the Jewish Chapel at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, and he is on the board of the Association of the Welfare for Widows and Orphans in Israel.

As well, he was one of the founders of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and a force behind the erection of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial and the Holocaust Wall of Remembrance at Earl Bales Park.

In 1992, he co-wrote a book, From Victims to Victors, about his experiences in the Holocaust. Proceeds from book sales support the educational work of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

In addition, through the David and Luba Smuschkowitz Family Charitable Foundation, the couple has donated to hospitals, schools and local charities here and in Israel.

Minnie Ross, Reena's communications manager, said there is a pressing need for seniors' housing for people with developmental disabilities. "Over 30 per cent of Reena clients are today over the age of 50, and they need age appropriate housing. By 2005, more than half will be seniors.

"People with developmental disabilities tend to age prematurely. In fact, the frailties and limitations that we might normally associate with a 65-year-old are the realities for a 50-year old with a developmental disability," Ross said.

Residents of the elderhome receive specialized care by professionals who are trained to deal with the dual challenge of a developmental disability and the physical and cognitive impairments associated with normal aging, she said.

"This home remains the standard for other agencies to achieve in addressing the needs of a like population."

David joked that he and Luba, the parents of four and grandparents of nine, also accepted the Reena honour because campaign chair Alex Eisen is a "real nudnick."

David said that as Holocaust survivors – he and his wife were both born in Jody, Poland – it's important to them to "give something back to a country that has been so good to us.

"My mother and three siblings survived the war because a Righteous Gentile helped us out. They risked their lives to help Jews, and I decided that when I could, I would help out as well.

"At the time, I did not know where I'd be, but I decided that I would never forget, and never forgive."

D-DAY REMEMBRANCE: Former World War II RCAF navigator Sid Gladstone placed a wreath on behalf of the Jewish Canadian Military Museum, a nascent organization that grew from the Canadian Jewish Military Archives, during D-Day remembrance ceremonies that took place at Queen's Park on June 6. Also in attendance were Ontario Lt.-Gov. James K. Bartleman, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, Toronto Mayor David Miller, and Gladstone's wife of 58 years, Shirley.

Ratepayers' group stands against anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the midst of a disturbing increase of attacks on Jews, one ratepayers' group has drawn a line in the sand and announced "Not in my backyard."

The Bridlebrook Park Homeowners' Association, which represents families in the Finch and Leslie area, last week distributed a letter to more than 300 homes deploring and condemning an anti-Semitic slur directed at a local family in an anonymous letter.

"We feel it is imperative to speak out against all instances of racist behaviour such as that exhibited in this letter," wrote Delia Perry, president of the homeowners' group, in a statement to the community.

"The Bridlebrook Park Homeowners' Association takes the strongest exception to this letter. The sentiments expressed are unacceptable to our community and must be met with the strongest censure and disapproval."

The incident that prompted the association's response occurred a few days before, when the Budlovsky family, immigrants from Czechoslovakia, received an unsigned letter addressed to "people of the house or grandparents," complaining about the crying of a young girl.

The three-year old child, their niece's daughter who was visiting from the Czech Republic, got a sliver while playing in the backyard one afternoon, and she cried while it was being removed.

"Is that screaming kid gone yet?" the letter asked. Saying her husband was trying to sleep on his day off, the letter writer complained that the "parents never had the decency to control the kid. SHUT UP… Typical Jews 'loud'. Everything for attention. No consideration for others."

Michael Budlovsky was outraged when he read the letter. Having experienced anti-Semitic prejudice growing up in the Bohemia region of Czechoslovakia, he said he was "not willing to put up with anti-Semitism here and not climb under a rock as some people would do. People have to stand up for their rights."

Budlovsky informed police about the letter, but was told the incident didn't fit the definition of a hate crime.

The ratepayers' group, however, shared his outrage. Perry and a neighbour drafted a letter to the community in which the group condemned the incident and "profoundly apologize[d] to the Budlovsky family for the behaviour and despicable sentiments expressed by the author of the letter."

Budlovsky, who has lived in the area for 20 years, said, "I was pleasantly surprised that the neighbours, the community and the friends in the community have taken it upon themselves to write this particular letter.

"It's wonderful to see people upset about issues of this nature."

Perry said she felt "disgust and sadness that this could happen in our neighbourhood."

With only one road in and out of the area, the neighbourhood is like a small town where everyone knows everyone else. "People who spoke to me were saddened to think this would happen in this tight-knit community," she said.

Gilda Berger, an area resident, said "many of us in the neighbourhood, particularly those of us who are Jewish, feel heartened by the community's swift response in expressing strong disapproval of the behaviour of the anonymous letter writer. The community has taken a stand.

"It is perhaps a small anti-Semitic incident, but it reflects an abhorrent sentiment that is currently quite rampant. I, as a Jew and a resident of this community, feel comforted and proud that this incident has commanded a big-hearted and large response."

Associated ranks at the top in math contests

Associated Hebrew Schools was the only Jewish day school to place in the top 25 ranked schools in the recent Canadian National Mathematics League Contest.

Placing eighth overall in team scores in Ontario, Associated came 22nd out of 423 schools in the Grade 8 division and 15th out of 494 schools in the Grade 7 division.

Grade 7 student Adina Goldberg student tied for second place in Canada and second place in Ontario with a score of 39 out of 40.

It was Adina's second year competing in this math contest. "While math is not my favourite subject," she says, "I do enjoy the enriched math program and competing with students from all other provinces."

The Canadian National Mathematics League Contest, sponsored by the University of Windsor, is for students from Grade 6 through high school.

The Associated team included Ryan Fisch, Rachel Charney, Julie-Rae King, Josh Satok, Evan Reinblatt, Stuart Posluns, Gideon Berger, Jonathan Singer and Ari Cuperfain.

Adina also placed first in her school in the Canada-wide Gauss Math Contest, sponsored by the University of Waterloo, with a perfect score at the Grade 7 level.

Grade 7 students Ryan Fisch and Alec Levin tied for second place, while Josh Liptin took third place.

At the Grade 8 level, Gideon Berger placed first in Associated, followed by Mark Auspitz, who came in second, and Tamar Fleisher and Ari Cuperfain, who tied for third.

York U professors launch web 'museum'

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

The International Committee of Museums and the Canadian government define museums as buildings that house actual or real artifacts and objects.

When York University visual arts professors Shelley Hornstein, Reesa Greenberg and Carol Zemel decided to create Mosaica, their "museum" devoted to contemporary Jewish art and culture, they quickly realized it did not fit the standard definition.

That's because Mosaica, at www.mosaica.ca, doesn't have a physical location – it's the first web-only exhibition venue dedicated to Jewish culture.

"Rather than build a bricks-and-mortar museum that very few could visit on a regular basis, we thought, why not take advantage of the web to create a structure that would reach across the country and be accessible to all," said Hornstein.

Explores 'diasporic histories, experiences'

At Mosaica's June 8 launch at York, which provided start-up funding for the project, Greenberg thanked everyone for coming and joked, "It might be more in keeping with Mosaica if we were all online."

Three art pieces are currently being showcased on the site. They deal with what its founders call the "Digital Diaspora," and "evoke different diasporic histories and experiences."

One work, an eight-minute video by Louis Kaplan and Melissa Shiff titled "Looking for Ararat," explores "Maj. Mordecai Noah's attempt to transform Grand Island, New York, into a city of refuge for the Jews in the 1820s," the site says.

The film is about "imaginary Jewish homelands," Greenberg said, describing it as "an ironic and critical journey" that shows "being Jewish does not reside in any specific territory."

Greenberg and Hornstein said because the projects only exist on the web, a virtual community is created for artists and audiences everywhere.

"The web may be virtual, but it connects people wherever they live. We believe that embracing the web as a medium is a decisive step in connecting and creating Jewish cultures across space and time," Greenberg said.

To create Mosaica, Greenberg and Hornstein analyzed the esthetics and content of existing Jewish and Jewish museum websites.

"We found very few models for what Mosaica wanted to do," Greenberg said.

Greenberg and Hornstein said they found all the Jewish sites they examined used blue, either as the sole colour of the homepage, or as a colour accent.

"Blue is a symbolic way of making a visual connection to Jewishness," said Greenberg. "Mosaica wants to make a visual connection to Jewish culture, but we don't want it to be so formulaic or traditional."

The Mosaica site is a "vibrant contemporary green that is associated with new life," Hornstein said, while the pieces of the large circular mosaic logo "convey constant change and flux."

Greenberg and Hornstein said their goal is to add more artists' projects to the site. They are looking for pieces about "Jews and the Diaspora: Jewish Culture, Web Culture, New Culture." They encourage projects that represent all of the arts, including, visual art, music, theatre, photography, film and architecture.

Protest greets Mary Robinson at McGill U

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Demonstrators outside the Roddick Gates held placards reading "No Degree for Durban," as McGill University awarded an honorary doctor of laws to Mary Robinson on the other side during the law school convocation.

The silent vigil on June 4, organized by B'nai Brith Canada, drew about 20 protesters who considered Robinson, the former United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, unworthy of the honour. She presided over the UN World Conference Against Racism in September, 2001, in Durban, South Africa, "which gave voice to some of the worst demonstrations of anti-Semitism and attacks against Israel in more than 50 years," B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant said in a statement distributed at the protest.

"She was the driving force behind that ironically named conference, overseeing what was little more than an intellectual pogrom against Jews and Israel. To date, Ms Robinson accepts no responsibility for the conference's racist stance against Israel and the Jewish people and, in fact, insists that much good came from it," the statement said.

The protesters' placards also quote her statement at the end of Durban, "We… succeeded," accompanied by a chart indicating that anti-Semitic incidents in Canada rose dramatically after September 2001.

"The conference did succeed, if she means greater anti-Zionism and more terrorism," said B'nai Brith Quebec director Bill Surkis.

Amos Sochaczevski, national chair of B'nai Brith's Institute for International Affairs, said Robinson, throughout her five years as High Commissioner, was "one-sided in defence of Palestinian terror by unjustifiably blaming it on Israeli 'occupation.'

"By granting this honorary doctorate, McGill has tarnished its reputation and is complicit in lending legitimacy to the Durban conference and tacitly giving its approval to Ms Robinson's positions. It sends the message that those who hate Israel are honoured at McGill."

Abe Gonshor, a B'nai Brith board member, said, "Why did McGill pick her when there are so many good people out there? It's mind-boggling."

The protest aroused little interest among passersby, except for a few curious questions. At least two people asked who "Durban" was. One man, who identified himself as the father of a graduate at the convocation, said the protest was "very necessary, very appropriate," but would not give his name.

There was no hint of controversy at the convocation, held on the campus lawn in a marquee. McGill chancellor Richard Pound praised Robinson as "a shining example, a model, of what can be accomplished by a rigourous lawyer at the service of the world community."

Dean of law Nicholas Kasirer called Robinson "a distinguished lawyer and public servant, known the world over for her commitment to social justice… ardent and courageous throughout her career."

In her address, Robinson made no allusion to Durban or the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The former Irish president focused on the need to find solutions to the conditions in underdeveloped countries and the growing gap between rich and poor.

"While one billion of the world's people hold 80 per cent of global wealth, another billion struggle to survive." She warned that those living in desparately poor nations have become "disillusioned with a world they see as unfair."

She also spoke of "the delicate balance" between protection of human rights and "the needs of the state in times of crisis." She feels human rights have been eroded in the war on terrorism and hopes the "shocking images" from the Abu Graib prison in Iraq will raise awareness about the need to respect human rights.

McGill history professor Gil Troy was the leading opponent of Robinson receiving an honorary degree. In the Gazette on May 2, he wrote that honouring her "sends a terrible message" at a time of "ever-coarsening anti-Semitism and despicable rationalizations for suicide bombings."

A series of letters pro and con followed in the newspaper for a couple of weeks.

Just when things appeared to be dying down, the McGill Reporter, the organ of the university's public relations department, published a stinging letter on May 27 by Slawomir Poplawski, a technician in the mining and metallurgical department, against "small and mean personalities," namely Troy, opposed to Robinson. It was the first mention of the issue in the Reporter.

"Deep down, it is not about the historian's [Troy's] attack on this honourable woman for her allegedly anti-Semitic views, but about politically correct rhetoric from opportunists putting down others for personal reasons… People like Mrs. Robinson are not liked by the forces of money and greed that dominate our world: she poses a danger to their single-minded cynicism." It ended, "Let's hope that the June 4 convocation will see some calm among the more destructive elements around us."

Poplawski published a longer version of the letter on his website.

The final salvo in the various exchanges came from Troy, who insisted the university disseminate his response to Poplawski's letter, which Troy called "an anti-Semitic screed, filled with code words."

After "intensive negotiations" over the weekend preceding convocation week, the university agreed to insert a page with Troy's letter in all 10,000 copies of the Reporter that were still on campus in time for the start of convocation week May 31. The original letter was also removed from the Reporter's website.

Troy said he felt it was imperative to provide his rebuttal in the same issue because so many parents, and possibly grandparents who are Holocaust survivors as well as other visitors, would be on campus that week.

The insert includes an explanation from Reporter editor Maeve Haldane, who says that Troy's letter was being distributed in this way "in the pursuit of fairness and balance" and because the paper would not publish again until September. Letters to the editor, she adds, do not represent the views of the university.

Troy's brief response (he says his original version was edited down) is under the heading "For a reasoned and respectful debate."

"My arguments – with which reasonable people can disagree – were not 'speculative insinuations,' as Mr. Poplawski charges, but considered assessments, backed by eyewitness accounts from the Durban conference and its preliminaries. I raised legitimate issues questioning the decision to award Mary Robinson an honorary doctorate. My arguments have been distorted by this letter writer and others…

"I urge everyone to demonstrate to our students and parents that we can disagree intelligently, respectfully and substantively, focussing on the issues rather than casting aspersions and making wild, inaccurate and personal accusations, let alone using offensive, conspiratorial language more reminiscent of the failed conference at Durban than suited to McGill University's official news organ."

Neo-cons wrongly linked to a 'Jewish agenda'

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's column looked at the troubling new trend of how some in the media are blaming Israel for the United States' misfortunes in Iraq, including an analysis of Nicholas Kristof's New York Times column on the subject. At the same time, certain critics of the war in Iraq are reviving another enemy: the "neo-cons."

A recent proponent of the blame-the-neo-cons-theory is retired general Anthony Zinni, who was quoted approvingly – and at length – in Kristof's column. In a May 23 interview on CBS's 60 Minutes with correspondent Steve Kroft, Zinni said, "I blame the civilian leadership of the Pentagon directly" for leading the United States into the war in Iraq.

Zinni remarked that "those who… foisted this strategy on us that is flawed… ought to be gone and replaced."

Kroft elaborates: "Zinni is talking about a group of policymakers within the administration known as the 'neo-conservatives' who saw the invasion of Iraq as a way to stabilize American interests in the region and strengthen the position of Israel. They include Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz; Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith; former Defense Policy Board member Richard Perle; National Security Council member Elia Abrams; and Vice-President Cheney's Chief of Staff, Lewis 'Scooter' Libby.

Paul Wolfowitz

"Zinni believes they are political ideologues who have 'hijacked American policy in Iraq.'"

That the neo-cons are also overwhelmingly Jewish is often a subtext of the criticism. Indeed, for some, neo-con is a code term for Jew (even though many of the leading adherents – such as Condoleezza Rice, a devout Southern Baptist – are decidedly not Jewish).

The highly respected Zinni has never given any indication that he harbours anti-Jewish feelings, and he is understandably indignant at the suggestion.

"[In] one article," he said, "because I mentioned the neo-conservatives who describe themselves as neo-conservatives, I was called anti-Semitic. I mean, you know, [it's] unbelievable that that's the kind of personal attacks that are run when you criticize a strategy and those who propose it. I certainly didn't criticize who they were. I certainly don't know what their ethnic religious backgrounds are."

Other commentators do make a direct connection between neo-conservatives and an alleged Jewish agenda.

In the March/April issue of Adbusters, a leftist Canadian magazine known for its cultural criticism, editor Kelle Lasn wrote a controversial article called "Why won't anyone say they are Jewish?" Alongside a list of people whom Lasn termed "the 50 most influential neocons in the U.S.," he wrote: "[T]he neocons seem to have a special affinity for Israel that influences their political thinking and consequently American foreign policy in the Middle East… Some shape policy from within the White House, while others are more peripheral, exacting influence indirectly as journalists, academics and think tank policy wonks. What they all share is the view that the U.S. is a benevolent hyper power that must protect itself by reshaping the rest of the world into its morally superior image. And half of them are Jewish."

Anthony Zinni

At least Lasn was criticized by a number of people in the Canadian media for his views.

More recently, the inveterate Israel-bashing British journalist David Hirst argued that the "neo-cons" manipulated Bush into supporting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's "expansionist designs" ("Worst is yet to come as U.S. pays price of failure," Guardian, June 4).

Richard Perle

Compare the vilification of the neo-cons above to the responsible, sober analysis from The Economist in its May 29 "Special Report: America and the Middle East": "The neo-cons were concerned not to enforce Israeli hegemony, but rather to break the U.S. of its habit of supporting corrupt Arab dictatorships which had turned the so-called 'Arab system' into a factory for anti-American terrorism. In the long run, fighting terrorism would, therefore, require creating a democratic Arab world at peace with American values."

The Economist, which over the years has not been noted for taking a pro-Israeli stance, recognizes that rather than controlling Bush, the neo-cons proposed ideas that "chimed neatly" with the aims of the administration. In short, there was a meeting of minds – not a conspiracy – two entirely different views of the lead-up to the war in Iraq.

'Reason for hope and optimism'

Anti-semitism, internationally and here in Canada, was a predominant theme of the program as speaker after speaker described its rise throughout the world. The general consensus was that, despite the incidents of vandalism and hate we have witnessed locally, Canada is still the best country in the world for Jews, after Israel.

"The Jews have to move from restitution to reconciliation," said Rabbi Israel Singer, chair of the governing board of the World Jewish Congress, in his keynote address. "They have to move from the era where they continuously think that the world is against them to the possibility that they have something to offer the world – hope and promise and a dream."

Israel Ambassador Haim Divon praised the CJC for its advocacy work, noting the respect members of the Canadian government have shown him, thanks to the efforts of CJC.

"There is still a battle to win, the battle for peace," he said. "We need to know that whatever we decide, we have a committed community behind us with a strong leadership."

In his final address as president of CJC, Keith Landy highlighted some of the accomplishments of the organization during his term and offered some "optimistic but sober lessons" to be learned: "Jews being under siege is an old story – we are a convenient scapegoat – but we have survived and we will survive… We must not only fight for our Jewish community, but we must fight to help others and to establish the universal values of goodness that will make for a better world… and we must preserve the memory of the past."

Landy offered words of encouragement. "Let us accentuate the positive, focus on the essence of who we are, what we do best and whom we represent as Canadian Jewish Congress. Let us continue our good work on behalf of our community, our country, our beloved State of Israel, and for justice and human rights for all humankind."

Incoming president Ed Morgan, is set to take on the task. "As great and tolerant as this society is, anti-Semitism is still alive here," he said. "We can win the battle. It is not futile… I firmly believe that Congress is up to the task and I look forward to working with them."

A panel discussion on "Terrorism: Combating the Threat to Collective and Individual Security" disclosed the most frightening reality about terrorism: that the terrorists are not just fighting against a particular policy, but against who we are.

"Their goal is that the entire world will be Islamic, under their control," said Yehudit Barsky, director of the American Jewish Committee's Division on Middle East and International Terrorism. "We need to be aware of the fact that terrorist organizations operate on an international level and we need to make the laws equal. We need parallel punishments for terrorists around the world."

National Post reporter Stewart Bell, who specializes in issues of national security, said "CJC is one of the few organizations in Canada that take a principled stand against terrorism."

We are "a nation in denial," Bell said, and our politicians must begin to take the terrorism threat seriously, not wait until it strikes us close to home. National security is not even being mentioned by any of the candidates for the upcoming election, he noted.

The Alan Rose Human Rights Award for International Human Dignity was presented to Irwin Cotler. Adam Atlas was the recipient of the Brian A. Finestone Memorial Award. The Monroe and Minnie Abbey Award for young leadership was presented to Hershel Sahian.

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka and Dr. Victor Goldbloom were recipients of the Samuel Bronfman medals for distinguished service to the Jewish community. MP Richard Marceau, who introduced the bill that led to the establishment of Holocaust Memorial Day, received the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award.

NDPer apologizes for comments

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Edmonton-Strathcona NDP candidate Malcolm Azania apologized last week for 10-year-old comments about Jews that party leader Jack Layton condemned as "completely and utterly unacceptable."

In an Internet newsgroup 10 years ago, Azania, now 34, wrote that "as a group, Jews are, of course, Whites, and overall, the aggregate of White actions and inactions is Whitesupremacist [sic]."

In an apology on his campaign website, Azania, who is black, said he wants to reconcile with his "Jewish and White brothers and sisters," adding that "in using the term [white] 'supremacy,' I was not talking about hate or violence, but privilege… in the same way I have used the term 'male supremacy' to describe male privilege."

After controversy erupted last week, Layton asked Azania to meet with the Jewish leadership in his community and embark on a "process of reconciliation," but said it's too late to remove Azania as a candidate.

Azania has sent a letter of apology to Canadian Jewish Congress and said he plans to meet with B'Nai Brith Canada.

He told The CJN he can understand why people would be appalled at his insensitivity when they read the statements out of context, but he insisted most people, including the Jews he associates with, know that he "would never call Jewish people Nazis."

Since posting the comments, titled "Jews: Enemies? Friends?" Azania said he has matured.

"It's not an excuse to say I was passing through a brief and stupid phase. But it does partly help to show where I was coming from," Azania said in his online apology.

He told The CJN he hopes those he hurt will realize he is "an anti-racist person."

Shoshana Szlachter, western regional director for B'Nai Brith Canada, told the Edmonton Journal that Azania's comments were "race battering and very anti-Semitic and basically outrageous," but Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) spokesperson Ron Singer said his organization is "willing to accept his apology" and "prepared to let it stand."

Had Azania's comments been written today, Singer said, "we would be calling for his removal" from the ballot, but because they are a decade old, Congress is more forgiving.

Singer said Azania's letter to Congress seems sincere and shows he understands his mistake.

NDP spokesperson Ian Capstick said Azania's views "have evolved" since 1994. He said Azania has been working with members of the Jewish community for years and has denounced bigotry.

Concern that Azania's comments will be a setback for the NDP is "not the issue at hand," Capstick said.

Largest Jewish riding could be a tight race

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

In Canada's most Jewish riding – where some 45 per cent of residents and both main parties' candidates are Jews – Israel is bound to come up as a flash-point in this election, as in the last.

Just before the 2000 vote, passions ran high over Canada's support for an Arab-sponsored United Nations resolution that condemned Israel for "excessive use of force" against Palestinians.

Suddenly, Israel was a political football.

Thornhill

Nevertheless, Elinor Caplan, the Liberal MP, went on to win Thornhill with nearly 65 per cent of the vote, trouncing her Alliance rival by 20,000 ballots.

But things are different this time, insists Josh Cooper, the Conservative hopeful in Thornhill. Cooper, who began stumping in the riding months before this election was called (initially as the Alliance candidate) and is enjoying high visibility, says the right in Canada has finally coalesced and is making strong headway in Thornhill.

"There was a divided opposition last time [between the Alliance and the Progressive Conservatives]," says Cooper, a 34-year-old father of two. "And this time, Israel is even more under attack than it was four years ago, and people are following [developments] much more closely."

Cooper says voters in the riding's Jewish neighbourhoods are "furious" about Canada's spotty voting record on Israel at the UN, as well as Ottawa's move to strip Canadian Magen David Adom of its charitable status (later resolved) and the Liberals' foot-dragging on banning Hezbollah and Hamas in Canada.

He says party leader Stephen Harper has made it clear that Israel has the right to defend itself and "has been very vocal on Israel. You're not going to find a greater defender of Israel or of democracy."

Cooper is founder, owner and operator of Par Golf Camps and, according to his website, has helped raise "tens of thousands of dollars" for many local charities, including UJA Federation, B'nai Brith, Reena Foundation, Friends of Simon Weisenthal Center and Honest Reporting Canada.

He's also chaired the UJA Federation/United Talmud Torahs Library Fund, which has helped raise more than $75,000 to help rebuild the Montreal day school that was firebombed in April.

Overall, the "number one" reason for voter anger at the Liberals "is a lack of respect for taxpayer dollars," Cooper says. "The sponsorship scandal, the gun registry… there's a real problem with accountability. When he was finance minister, Paul Martin cut $25 billion from health care. Promising $9 billion now for health care isn't going to cut it."

He's running "not to take a cut in pay, but because I'm disgusted by what I see representing us in Ottawa."

No sooner was the election called than Cooper demanded that his main rival, Liberal Susan Kadis, resign as a Vaughan municipal councillor while she campaigns.

Kadis, who has represented Ward 5 on council since 1997 and is a former two-term York Region public school trustee, calls Cooper's demand "negative, unfounded [and meant to] deflect from the issues. I'm a very good multi-tasker. How about we talk about the issues instead?"

Those would include health care, home care, transit (she favours extending the Yonge Street subway to Langstaff Road "at least") and a range of issues "that can best be addressed at the federal level."

Kadis, 51 and a mother of five, was chosen as the Liberal candidate after Caplan announced in February that she would not seek re-election. Generally, opinion seems to have Kadis and Cooper running neck and neck.

Bounded roughly by Highway 400, Rutherford Road, Highway 7, Highway 404 and Steeles Avenue; Thornhill's population is 116,840, of which 54,000 are immigrants and 49,000 have a mother tongue other than English or French. In the last provincial election, the riding slipped from Tory hands to the Liberals.

Many issues for Kadis boil down to quality of life.

"This whole election is about what kind of Canada we want, and health care is a metaphor." Prime Minister Paul Martin, she notes, has pledged billions for sustainable health care, day care, municipal infrastructure, and what she calls the "social fabric. It's where you choose to put money that reflects what you're all about."

Kadis says she's well-known in Thornhill and has a track record of reliability. "People know they can count on me. I'm a fighter. I'm passionate."

That extends to Israel. Kadis concedes she hasn't "always been happy" with the Liberals' record on the file, but "I hope to make [it] more balanced." She says Israel considers Canada a good friend and points out that Israel is the sole country outside North America that Canada has a free trade agreement with.

"I wouldn't run if I thought things were perfect," she says.

Both Kadis and Cooper have welcomed their leaders to Thornhill.

The NDP standard bearer in Thornhill, Rick Morelli, is running "because I felt it was time for a change. People want change."

The NDP polled 3.9 percent of the vote in Thornhill in 2000.

A 38-year-old father of two who co-owns two pharmacies, he doesn't see much of a difference between the Liberals and Conservatives.

"The minute either one gets to power, the corporate agenda rises to the surface. Real change and new ideas are championed by the NDP."

Concerns in the riding revolve around education and health care, he says. "Both of those are provincial jurisdictions, but it's Ottawa that transfers the funds." A government led by NDP leader Jack Layton would boost those payments, he says, and would have deeper involvement in public transit.

Morelli has noted concerns over hate crimes (he said penalties need to be more severe) and Israel. While the NDP clearly supports the existence of Israel, the party is "anti-war. We don't support military actions, anywhere. Ultimately, what everyone wants is peace, and we want to get everyone back to the negotiating table."

Morelli concedes Jewish voters tend not to support his party but he hopes they will this time, as more and more electors are cynical about the two main choices.

Green Party candidate Bridget Haworth is also running in Thornhill.

Israel's security is non-negotiable: Harper

the survival of Israel, is non-negotiable, and we have been very critical of the government for what we see as their lax attitude towards international terrorism and the operation of terrorist organizations and their supporters in this country. I think we've been pretty consistent. And some of those things took a surprising amount of pressure to get the Liberals to change on.

CJN: Would a Conservative government move Canada's embassy [from Tel Aviv] to Jerusalem?

Harper: No, not unless we had an international resolution to that issue.

CJN: Do you think it's time Canada abandon its traditional neutrality in the Middle East?

Harper: Well, I don't see Canada as neutral. Maybe that's where the Liberals have gone, but my view is that Israel is part of the democratic family of nations, of which Canada is a member. And obviously, we want to seek a resolution to the Middle East conflict, but that can never be at the expense of the right of Israel to exist or the right of Israel to defend itself from attack.

CJN: As you know, our community is the most targeted group when it comes to hate crimes (according to Statistics Canada). You have said you would change Canada's hate crimes laws. How would you change them and why?

Harper: First of all, let's remember that I was the first politician in the country to call for [native leader] Mr. [David] Ahenakew to be investigated for violating the Criminal Code for his attacks on the Jewish people. So I think my support for this is clear. There was a bill passed in Parliament just before the House rose, which many in our party had opposed, on protecting gays and lesbians from hate crimes. I've said that I have no problem with the concept of that protection, but I want to make sure that protection doesn't jeopardize the expression of legitimate religious and other beliefs. I would just like to see some amendments to make sure we don't leave it too vague or don't attempt to criminalize what happens to be expression of opinion.

CJN: One of your candidates has stated that your party has said very little and offered very little about multiculturalism. How do you respond?

Harper: Our platform concentrates on the major changes we would make, the things we would actually change. This is a multi-ethnic society and individual liberty involves the preservation of cultural heritage. We have a department of multiculturalism and multicultural programs. I haven't proposed making changes to those. And we will always evaluate them to see if we're getting the best money for them. And I'm very proud of the fact that what I've done with this party is make sure that we have diverse representation in cultural communities, and that is reflected in our [candidates].

CJN: Would you agree that traditionally, Canada's Jewish community has voted Liberal?

Harper: Oh, I think that's true. That's obviously true. I think that it's kind of strange, then, to see what you would describe as the neutralist attitude of the Liberal government towards the Israeli situation. It's not our attitude, and I think that's why we're finding, increasingly, younger Jewish voters are voting pretty strongly for us, and I think that trend will continue.

CJN: As you know, in 1999, Canada was rebuked by the United Nations with respect to Ontario's policy on funding religious-based schools [Catholic but not others]. How would your government rectify the imbalance in Ontario?

Harper: Well, I'm not sure that we can. When I was with the National Citizens Coalition, I very strongly supported the [Equity in] Education Tax Credit that the previous [provincial] Conservative government had brought into Ontario. For various reasons, including dealing with the United Nations decision, I regret that the current Liberal government has reversed that. It does seem to me to be a matter that's within their jurisdiction, so I don't know what we can do about it. We do have policies such as our Registered Lifetime Savings Plan that we're proposing, that would allow people more flexibility in terms of purchasing things like education, but I'm not sure that would really rectify the situation. I think it's going to have to be rectified provincially.

CJN: Your opponents have accused you of a hidden right-wing agenda. Tell us something that would allay the fears of voters who would take that as true?

Harper: I think you have to look at the record of the Liberal party. They talk about hidden agendas. The only thing hidden here is our money. They said they would get to the bottom of the sponsorship scandal and they didn't. [In] the last election, they said they would shut down private health clinics. Those clinics were expanded. The prime minister uses them himself. [In] the election before that, they said they would bring forward a more open policy [on] Quebec nationalists and they brought in the Clarity Act. [In] the election before that, they ran on running high deficits [and] being against free trade and the GST, and they reversed themselves on all those.

My history is, I do what I say I will do. The history of the Liberal party and this Liberal government is that whatever they run on is, in fact, the opposite of what they will do. I think history will indicate the only people with hidden agendas are Liberals.

CJN: What about the other spectre that has been raised – that a minority Harper government would be forced to work with the Bloc Québécois? Can you envision working with the BQ?

Harper: No. I've said repeatedly that I can see no possibility of a coalition or alliance with the Bloc. Mr. Martin has [former Quebec premier] Lucien Bouchard's lieutenant in Quebec as his chief lieutenant. That's the deal he's done with a wing of the Bloc. [NDP leader Jack] Layton says he would recognize a unilateral declaration of independence in Quebec. I would do no such thing. I'm the only leader not playing footsie with the separatists in this campaign.

CJN: Your advertisement in our paper is headlined, "You're paying too much tax." Where would a Harper government begin? Give us a sense of its first 50 days in power on the tax issue.

Harper: [Laughs]. Well, I'll just tell you very quickly what the major tax reductions we propose are: We propose raising all tax brackets gradually and eliminating the lower-middle bracket. In other words, a significant tax cut for people earning in the $35,000-$70,000 range. We propose a tax credit for any family that has children, regardless of how those children are being raised. We're going to cut some of the gasoline taxes and give people more flexibility on retirement savings, in terms of tax treatment of those savings. Those would be the major things.

CJN: If you had a parting message to the Jewish community, what would it be?

Harper: I think the message would be: Look carefully at the record, look at all of our policies. I know voters are interested in all policies. I know Jewish voters are interested in all our various economic, social, democratic and foreign policies. But for those who care particularly about matters in relation to the State of Israel, there is simply no comparison between the other parties and ourself. We are the only party to have consistently stuck up for Israel's right to exist, its right to defend itself and for the special relationship Canada has with Israel. And that record is crystal clear.

Federal Election '04

Liberals fight to keep campaign on federal record

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Jim Peterson, the Liberal candidate in Willowdale, is confident that voters won't confuse the provincial and federal parties come election day.

Willowdale

With recent polls showing the Liberals and Conservatives running neck-and-neck, Peterson believes voters won't blame Prime Minister Paul Martin for the current unpopularity of Premier Dalton McGuinty's Ontario Liberals. The issue is a concern for many federal hopefuls from Ontario, especially since some pundits are suggesting that the province's ridings will be pivotal in the June 28 federal vote.

Alluding to the recent provincial budget that broke several campaign promises, including that taxes would not be raised, Peterson said, "Canadians will look at the prime minister's record and determine that Paul Martin has a history of fiscal responsibility.

"Martin is the only leader at the G-8 summit of major industrialized countries who is running a balanced budget," said Peterson, 63, who has represented Willowdale since 1980, with a hiatus from 1984 to 1988, when the riding was swept by Brian Mulroney's Conservatives.

The incumbent is a lawyer who taught at the University of Toronto law school, chaired the standing committee on finance from 1993 to 1997 and served as secretary of state for international financial institutions from 1997 to early 2002.

In the 2000 federal election, Peterson won the riding with 61 per cent of the vote, trouncing his nearest rival by nearly 20,000 votes.

The riding runs roughly between Steeles Avenue and Highway 401, Victoria Park Avenue and Bathurst Street and has a population of 108,454. Willowdale has been redrawn since the last election so that an area northeast of Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue is now in York Centre. The candidates estimate that between five and 10 per cent of Willowdale is Jewish.

Peterson feels voters appreciate Martin's integrity.

When the government was accused of awarding $250 million in questionable federal sponsorship contracts to Liberal-friendly advertising firms in Quebec, "Martin acted decisively by calling in the RCMP, appointing a special prosecutor to track down the funds and launching a judicial inquiry," Peterson said.

Peterson is a member of the Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, an official caucus committee that has presented a number of position papers to Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, including an analysis of this government's voting record at the United Nations.

On the issue of same-sex marriage, Peterson said he would not support the use of the notwithstanding clause to deny rights provided in the Charter of Rights.

"If we deny rights for one minority, who will be next?"

In light of the recent increase in anti-Semitic attacks, Peterson suggests there may be a role for the federal government to play in funding anti-racism education. And while he has supported funding for Jewish schools, he doesn't think the federal government can intervene in provincial matters.

Jovan Boseovski, the Conservative hopeful in Willowdale, said the most pressing issue facing the government today has "got to be accountability.

"There has to be some accountability for the inappropriate spending habits of the current government," Boseovski said, referring to the sponsorship scandal and the billions of dollars spent on the gun registry.

Boseovski, who describes himself as a moderate Conservative – someone from the Progressive Conservative side of the recent merger with the Alliance party – is reluctant to disclose his age (he's under 30), noting that "[Quebec Premier] Jean Charest was already a [federal cabinet] minister at 28.

"Environmental policies need to be a major federal concern," said Boseovski, who is the economic development officer for the Regional Municipality of Durham.

"I would like to see a push towards more environmentally friendly automobiles and policies that stimulate that," said the candidate, who has an MA in economic development from the University of Waterloo and a BA in urban planning from Ryerson University.

The Greater Toronto Area isn't getting its fair share of money from the federal government, Boseovski said.

"I would press for more funds for public transit infrastructure, traffic issues and environmental matters."

Regarding the 1999 United Nations decision that found Ontario's school funding practices discriminatory and in violation of UN covenants, Boseovski said if there is going to be funding for Catholic schools, there should be resources for everyone.

"When the province isn't dealing with things appropriately and puts Canada on a blacklist in the United Nations we [the federal government] need to put our influence into the provincial sphere."

He said Canada needs to support democracies such as Israel around the world, and negotiate with leaders who support peace.

"It's fairly clear that [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat has only one intention, and that intention isn't peace."

As for same sex marriage, "the economic rights of gays must be protected, and the way to do that is to support a civil union approach to gay marriage, which would also protect the traditional definition of marriage."

Boseovski said it's incumbent on Ottawa to get to the root of the increase in anti-Semitism that has affected Toronto and Montreal.

He would allocate more money for investigations into anti-Semitic groups and would toughen the laws that deal with those crimes.

Yvonne Bobb, again the NDP candidate (she ran in 2000, polling 2,400 votes, or 5.4 per cent of the total) stressed that poverty, homelessness and heath care must be the key issues for the federal government.

She would support increased funding for policing in those cases where racism is on the rise.

"I would make it an offence to exercise any kind of racism against any ethnic or religious community."

On the Middle East, Bobb suggests that "both side should cease the bombing" and that Canada has a role to play in that conflict because it is a country perceived to be pro-peace.

She also believes that it is incumbent on the government to "keep our people safe by preventing the smuggling of arms across borders." The NDP candidate is a program assistant at Ontario's Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing, president of her local union (Ontario Public Service Employees), co-chair of the ministry's employee relations committee and a human rights adviser. Bobb currently has no position on the UN decision on Ontario's school funding policy.

Bobb said she supports same-sex marriage but feels "each religious group should determine what they want."

The Green party candidate in Willowdale is Sharolyn Vettese.

Mazon gala draws over 600

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada's sixth annual Kosher Gourmet Gala held during the winter at Roy Thomson Hall, attracted more than 600 guests who sampled food and wine served by about 30 caterers, restaurants and wine distributors.

Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive director of Mazon Canada, says the gala raised more than $95,000, the proceeds of which will benefit the organization's work of allocating funds to more than 150 hunger-relief agencies across Canada.

Since 1986 when Mazon Canada was founded as a means by which the Jewish community could respond to the problem of hunger, Kott-Wolle said, the organization has contributed more than $4 million – in its fall allocations it granted $259,995 – to food banks, community kitchens, Out of the Cold shelters and children's breakfast clubs in almost every province across Canada.

Mazon Canada also raises awareness about the nature and severity of hunger and the ways by which members of the Jewish community can share their good fortune with those who do not have enough, she said.

"[We] encourage [people] to contribute a portion of their food expenditures when celebrating special occasions such as weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs. This way they can connect their celebration with the needs of those who are less fortunate."

The true success of the Kosher Gourmet Gala, she said, is "in the teamwork of our amazing committee of volunteers.

"Each and every one of them is to be commended for enlisting our volunteer caterers, musicians and decorator, not to mention collecting donations of raffle prizes. This is volunteerism at its best," said Kott-Wolle.

She offers some recipes contributed by gala participants.

More than $95,000 raised

WOOLEY'S LANE ZUCCHINI

From Renee Simmons
gala committee volunteer

4 zucchini, washed and ends trimmed off
1 onion, chopped
1 clove garlic, minced
2 tbsp. butter
1 tbsp. olive oil salt
fresh ground pepper

Grate the zucchini into a colander. Add salt and allow to drain for about half an hour. In a heavy skillet, heat butter and oil over medium heat. Add onion and garlic and sauté until softened. Add zucchini and stir fry quickly for about 2 minutes. Season to taste with freshly ground pepper. Serve immediately.

ORZO SALAD

From Linda Pack
gala committee volunteer

1½ cup orzo (rice shaped pasta)
⅓ cup oil packed sundried tomatoes, chopped and drained
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
¼ cup balsamic vinegar
¼ cup black kalamata olives, chopped
1 cup ricchio, chopped
½ cup pine nuts, toasted
½ cup fresh basil chopped
½ cup parmesan cheese, freshly grated

Cook orzo in boiling water until just tender (approx. 15 to 20 minutes). Drain well. Transfer to a large bowl. Add sundried tomatoes, oil, vinegar and olives. Toss to blend. Let stand until cool. Mix in the rest of the ingredients. Season to taste with salt and pepper and serve. Recipe can be prepared up to step one six hours ahead. If refrigerating let the salad come to room temperature before continuing with step 2. Yield: 8-10 servings.

ORANGE HONEY CHICKEN

From Lyndy Goldlust
gala committee volunteer

½ cup honey
½ cup orange juice
1 cup ketchup
1 tbsp. soya sauce
4 cloves crushed garlic.
2 chickens

Preheat oven to 400. Mix all ingredients together. Pour over chicken. Bake uncovered for one hour. Yield: 8-10 servings.

RABBI YOSSI'S ULTRA LOW FAT CRISPY SCHNITZEL

From Rabbi Yossi Saperman
Mazon board member

This recipe can be used for Passover by substituting matzah meal for the bread crumbs.

4 boneless skinless tenderized chicken breasts
1½ cup seasoned bread crumbs
1 beaten egg
Variations: Combine the above ingredients with ½ cup grated Gruyere cheese. Place in a baking dish. Top with grated parmesan cheese.

Combine the above ingredients with 1 cup cooked rice and ½ cup grated gruyere cheese. Place in a baking dish. Top with grated parmesan cheese.

Bake at 350 for 20 minutes. Yield: 4 servings.

oil cooking spray

Dip chicken breast in egg, coat fully. Bread on both sides. Repeat the above. Spray a non-stick frying pan with cooking spray and heat. Quickly brown the chicken on both sides. Turn frequently until crisp. Do not leave or it will burn. When crisp on both sides, set aside on paper towel. When all portions are fried, place in a microwave-safe dish, covered with plastic wrap. Leave a one-inch slit in plastic wrap to allow steam to escape. Microwave on medium-high for a minimum of 3.5 minutes per piece (add 30 seconds per additional portion). Cooking time may vary depending on the microwave. Spray and reheat frying pan. Place the chicken in the pan and turn frequently until the outer coat is crisp again. Serve immediately. Yield: 4 servings.

BRAZILIAN FEIJAO AND RICE

From Jacqueline Kott-Wolle
Mazon executive director

In addition to being a devoted mother and loving safta, my mother-in-law Rivka Wolle is a wonderful cook. Before coming to Canada, Rivka lived in many countries and learned to make this hearty bean dish in Brazil. Try it! You'll see why I married her son.

Bean dish
3 cups black beans
1 large onion, chopped
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 strip of flanken (optional)
6 cloves of garlic, mashed
6 cups water
1 bay leaf
salt to taste

Pre-soak beans overnight (or for a few hours) to reduce cooking, time. In a large pot, boil water. Add beans and flanken (if using). Cover and simmer 1½ hours until beans are soft. In a separate pan over medium heat, sauté onion and garlic in olive oil until golden. Stir into bean stew, add bay leaf and continue to cook covered for ½ hour. Add salt to taste. Add more water if stew becomes thick.

Rice dish
1 cup parboiled rice
2 cups water
1 medium onion, chopped
4 cloves garlic, mashed
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. salt

In a saucepan over medium heat sauté onions and garlic in olive oil until golden. Add dry rice and mix well. Add water and salt. Bring to a boil, turn down heat, cover and simmer for 20 minutes.

Serve feijao over rice and enjoy! This dish freezes well. Yield: 6 servings.

Sharon prepares for Gaza pullout

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told government colleagues Sunday to limit their vacation time abroad this summer to ensure a full and supportive turnout for any discussions on withdrawing troops and settlers from the Gaza Strip by the end of 2005.

"I instructed those heading the committees to begin work immediately and without delay, in order to keep to the timetable set by the plan," Sharon said at the weekly cabinet meeting. "I will not accept a situation whereby members of government abstain from votes, or this or that deputy minister speaks out against the resolution."

After receiving hard-won government approval for his Gaza plan, Sharon means business.

He is not alone. Dozens of settlers from Gaza and four West Bank communities slated for removal have already contacted the Prime Minister's Office in the hope of taking advantage of a relocation package of $300,000 for each family, according media reports.

Compensation can be claimed as early as this August, officials said, and settlers who do not voluntarily move to Israel proper within 13 months will be evacuated forcibly from their homes. With the settlers council for Yesha (Judea, Samaria and Gaza) claiming that most settlers slated for evacuation have signed a declaration saying they will stay put no matter what, the spectre of violent confrontations looms large for Sharon.

But the prime minister has been bolstered by the international community.

Last Friday, Sharon took a call from UN Secretary General Kofi Annan congratulating him on his efforts to disengage Israel from the Palestinians after 3½ years of dead-end conflict. Annan offered any assistance necessary in implementing the Gaza plan and, according to Jerusalem sources, Sharon has not ruled out a UN peacekeeping role in Gaza.

Meanwhile, Hamas has vowed to continue terrorizing Israelis regardless of the disengagement plan.

"We will continue the struggle against Israel even after it pulls back," Mahmoud Al-Zahar, acting head of the Islamist group, said at a conference of Palestinian factions in Gaza City on Saturday.

But aides to Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qurei, who attended the meeting, were more upbeat, saying politics could sidetrack Hamas from its jihad.

"Dr. Zahar said his organization will take part in elections after the withdrawal and will be willing to take part in the leadership that arises in Gaza," one Palestinian official told Israel's daily Yediot Achronot.

Egypt, too, may serve as a mediating force during a withdrawal. It has offered to send security advisers to Gaza to bolster Palestinian security forces to the point where they could take on Hamas after an Israeli pullback.

Many Palestinians view stability as the key to attracting foreign donations to rehabilitate Gaza's Palestinians.

Hamas leader says attacks against Israel to continue

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA CITY — The Islamic militant group Hamas will continue attacks against Israelis despite plans to withdraw settlements and military bases from the Gaza Strip, a top Hamas leader in Gaza said Saturday.

"We do not trust the Israelis and we do not trust that the Israelis are going to withdraw from Gaza while they are speaking of controlling the sea and the air. Until the occupation completely ends, our resistance will continue," Mahmoud Al-Zahar said.

"Evacuating the Gaza Strip does not mean the end of the Israeli occupation, therefore we need answers regarding the issue of prisoners, borders, water resources, airspace and economic trade as soon as possible," he said.

"The only guarantee we can give so far is the continuation of the resistance."

Al-Zahar's comments came as Egyptian officials worked on an agreement for maintaining security in Gaza, Hamas' stronghold, in the wake of the planned pullback.

Egypt has offered to send security advisers to Gaza to help train and equip Palestinian forces, but Al-Zahar said he rejected the proffered assistance.

"We are against any sort of commitment to any security steps on any side," Al-Zahar told reporters in Gaza City. "We are still in the resistance... to free our land from the occupation."

However, he later said Hamas leaders abroad were expected to begin talks with Egyptian officials within a few days.

Al-Zahar spoke before meeting with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, who made a rare trip to Gaza for talks with the heads of the various Palestinian security branches and members of Palestinian political and militant groups.

It was Al-Zahar's first public appearance since the funeral of Hamas' Gaza leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi, who was killed by Israel in April. Many Hamas leaders have gone into hiding since then, though it is considered unlikely Israel would target Hamas leaders during a meeting with Qureia.

Al-Zahar said continued Israeli presence is unacceptable.

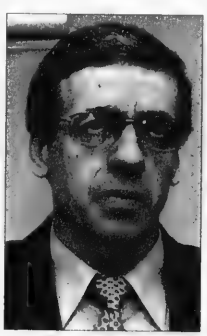
He did leave open the possibility that Hamas, which rejects the existence of Israel and hopes to replace it with an Islamic state, could change its position.

"When we hear something concrete, about full sovereignty, we will think about what is proposed to us," he said. "At this moment, our position stands firm. Our endeavour is a liberation endeavour, and if this liberation is not a full and comprehensive one, our endeavour will continue."

Mazuz likely to close Greek island case

By YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Attorney General Menachem Mazuz has apparently decided not to go ahead with an indictment against Sharon – either for bribe-taking or for fraud and breach of trust arising from the so-called Greek island affair.



Menachem Mazuz

The reason for the decision in each of the counts is lack of sufficient evidence, especially evidence of criminal intention, that is, the possibility of having to prove the extent to which Sharon was aware of the connection between the favours he allegedly received from businessman David Appel and the assistance he allegedly granted to pressure the Greek government into giving its permission to establish a resort and casino on the island of Patroklos.

Mazuz had reached his decision on the indictment before Sunday's meeting with his legal team, but the meeting served to tie up the remaining loose ends. Afterward, the attorney general began drafting the reasons for the decision, to be published this week.

Along with the decision on Sharon, the attorney general will also announce his decision on whether to bring Sharon's son, Gilad, to trial. The two decisions are inextricably related. If Mazuz closes the case of Sharon Sr., he will be obliged to close the case of Sharon Jr., too, to avoid the contradiction of a bribery-mediation charge without charging anyone with receiving the bribe.

If the two are not indicted, Appel will also demand that the charges brought against him for bribing Sharon be stricken.

CAMP DIRECTOR 2005

Summer camp seeks a dynamic and energetic person for the position of Camp Director for the 2005 summer season. The successful applicant will have experience in Jewish summer camping or informal Jewish education. Your imagination, creativity and motivational skills are critical. Will continue to be home to Jews: French PM

By DANIEL BEN SIMON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — French Prime Minister Jean Pierre Raffarin was seated at the hospital bedside of Yisrael Yifrah two days after Yifrah was stabbed in his north Paris neighbourhood last week by a Muslim man who punctuated the act with the cry "Allahu Akhbar."

Yifrah was badly wounded, and France bent over backward to express its disgust at the attempted murder. Raffarin, accompanied by a large retinue of aides and journalists, spoke to Yifrah's parents as though he were a member of the family. He condemned the attack, apologized for France, and inquired after the family, urging them to turn to him if they needed help.

In his grief, the father suddenly turned to Raffarin and said: "I regret emigrating to France. When we left Morocco I never imagined that one of my children would be lying in the hospital because of a Muslim who sought to kill a Jew."

The father continued to unburden himself, and Raffarin listened patiently. "Had I known, I would have emigrated to the United States, because only there can we feel safe."

Raffarin placed his hand on the father's shoulder and promised France would continue to be home to Jews, and their natural place.

Jonathan Arfi, chairman of the French Jewish Student Association and an eyewitness to the scene, said that Raffarin was visibly moved by the father's speech, "because it was genuine, and because it stemmed from pain."

Arfi does not feel the same way about the Jewish Agency's calls for French Jews to immigrate to Israel. He was astonished to hear it is planning to bring tens of thousands of Jews to Israel to supposedly save them from the terrors of anti-Semitism.

"That's hardly serious," he said in a mocking tone. "I really don't see French Jewry leaving the country overnight. In the past three years, only 2,000 to 3,000 Jews moved to Israel each year, out of the 600,000 living in France, and I see no reason why that number should rise."

Arfi, like many in French Jews, admits that tensions have increased in the past year, and the sense of insecurity has grown. "But from that to a mass exodus of Jews to Israel, the distance is enormous," he said.

Arfi finds the hurtful tone of calls to French Jews to flee to be troubling.

"The French don't like the way Israel treats the country's Jews, as though they were reserve soldiers or a stockpile of people for times of crisis," he said. "That is not a political message the French like, and it is certainly not a political message the Jews like. It doesn't help us, and I would even say that it hurts us."

The Jewish community was astounded by reports the Jewish Agency is planning to bring Jews from the streets of Paris to Israel. Community leaders were scheduled to meet this week with President Jacques Chirac to discuss the stabbing of the Jewish yeshiva student.

One expressed concern the meeting's agenda might change.

"Instead of Chirac expressing sorrow for the incident, he will likely attack Israel for its declarations about removing Jews from France," he said.

The Jewish Agency's declaration received little mention in French media, with most news devoted to European parliamentary elections and the France-England Euro 2004 soccer match.

Jewish leaders quietly protested to the Jewish Agency and wondered why they hadn't been consulted.

Roger Cukierman, chairman of the Council of French Jewish Institutions, the umbrella body representing France's Jewish groups, said Israel sideswiped him and skipped over the Jewish leadership. "We intend to protest," Cukierman said in a press release.

Haim Musicant, executive director of the CRIF umbrella organization, said that Israel is wrongly impugning France.

"France is not anti-Semitic, and President Chirac is not anti-Semitic," Musicant said. "Furthermore, the French government is doing everything to fight anti-Semitic phenomena. Israel could have kept us posted and co-ordinated with us before taking action regarding French Jews. To my chagrin, that did not happen."

Paris, Jerusalem to sign $200m weapons deal

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — France and Israel are expected to announce the signing of the biggest weapons deal between the two countries since the French embargo on weapons sales to Israel prior to the Six Day War.

The $150-million to $200-million (US) deal, to be signed during the Eurosatory 2004 international exhibition for land and land-air defence that opened earlier this week in Villepinte, north of Paris, will formally commission Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) to sell its expertise in the manufacture of drones for France's major defence industries, to combat aircraft manufacturer Dassault Aviation and the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company (EADS).

Defence ministry director-general Amos Yaron will participate in the ceremony marking the opening of the exhibition's Israeli pavilion, along with the Israeli ambassador to France, Nissim Zvilli. French Defence Minister Michele Alliot-Marie is due to visit the Israeli pavilion.

According to the contract, IAI will supply the expertise to manufacture the Eagle 1 drone, whose development is based on the strategic drone now in the service of the Israel Defence Forces. Three years ago, IAI sold this type of drone to the French army as part of co-operation with EADS. Now, with the encouragement of the French defence ministry, a consortium of French industries will be established to manufacture drones in France for, among other purposes, export to other countries.

Israeli security sources emphasize that in contrast to relations with the French foreign ministry, relations between the two countries' defence establishments have been on the upswing since the mid-1990s.

A delegation of the IDF's technology and logistics wing, headed by Brig.-Gen. Yaakov Nakash, visited France this month to meet with senior officers in the technology and logistics wing of the French army to discuss options for various co-operative ventures.

Anti-Semitic attacks rise in France

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Some Jewish officials are worried anti-Semites are escalating violence against Jews in France and that French courts are tacitly letting the attackers off by giving light sentences.

In the latest significant attack, community officials said an assailant tried to murder a yeshiva student, who was stabbed last week as he prepared for Shabbat at one of Europe's top talmudic academies.

Yisrael Yifrah, 17, was heading toward a local grocery store across from the Mekor Yisrael Yeshiva in Epinay-sur-Seine, a suburb north of Paris, last Friday when a large man, reported to be of North African origin, sprang upon him with a knife.

The man screamed, "God is great" in Arabic and plunged the knife into Yiftah's chest.

Police believe the same man carried out additional knife attacks that night against non-Jewish targets, but Jewish groups are in no doubt as to the anti-Semitic nature of the initial incident.

"The yeshiva's in a closed alleyway," said Sammy Ghozlan, president of the National Bureau for Vigilance against Anti-Semitism. "If you enter there with a knife in a bag, you're only going there for one purpose."

The attack represented a new level of anti-Semitic assault, the first with a deadly weapon, community leaders say. It comes amid an alarming increase in the intensity of anti-Jewish attacks in recent weeks.

In the past month, rabbis in Marseille and in the Parisian suburb of Creteil were attacked, and a rabbi's son was severely beaten near his home in Paris over Shavuot.

Government statistics show a steep rise in anti-Semitic incidents since the beginning of 2004. The 67 incidents reported for the first quarter of the year contrast sharply with the 34 incidents for the last quarter of 2003.

The figures also show that attacks against Jews make up the vast majority of racist crime, despite the fact that the Jewish community is one of France's smallest minority groups.

Paradoxically, the sharp rise in attacks has come at a time when Jewish groups acknowledge that the government has shown real willingness to tackle the problem of anti-Semitism.

The attacks have left Jewish community members wringing their hands. "The government has taken all sorts of measures to deal with this, and our synagogues are like fortresses," Ghozlan said. "They've even put on extra buses from railway stations so people don't walk around at night. What more can we do?"

Ghozlan has sharp words for the courts, which, he says, haven't been tough enough with offenders.

"People have been arrested, but it's not going to do any good if sentencing is not exemplary," he said.

Similar views are being expressed in France's large Jewish communal organizations.

In a forceful statement following last week's knife attack, the Conseil Représentatif des institutions juives de France, the umbrella organization of French Jews, said that "a new level had been breached" in anti-Semitic attacks in France, aided "by recent court decisions that give the feeling that one can attack Jews with total impunity."

Interior Minister Dominique de Villepin seemed to agree, telling French radio that the legislation was in place, "but it needs to be applied."

Events last week seemed to bear him out: When a group of youths pleaded guilty this week to the Shavuot attack on the rabbi's son, it became clear that one member had been involved in another attack on a Jewish youth earlier this year.

His penalty? The court instructed the youth to write a project on anti-Semitism.

Bones not those of Arad

Two human bone fragments transferred to Israel recently by Hezbollah are not from missing Air Force navigator Ron Arad, it was revealed last week. This is the second time in the past six months that Hezbollah has sent a human bone to Israel claiming it belongs to Arad, apparently in an attempt to implement the second phase of a prisoner swap initiated in January. In return for information about Arad, Israel has promised to free a large number of prisoners in its jails.

Anti-Palestinian violence up

The number of attacks against Palestinians by Jewish settlers is up, according to police. In a report issued last week, police noted increased violence against Palestinians, particularly in the northern West Bank and Hebron areas. They pointed to a 15 per cent increase in the number of police files opened against settlers for attacks on Palestinians, mostly in cases involving theft of equipment, destruction of property or physical attacks.

Robot used in spinal surgery

An Israeli professor's mini-robot for spinal surgery has received approval for use in the United States. SpineAssist, created by Moshe Shoham at Haifa's Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, is expected to be in use worldwide by the end of 2004. According to Shoham, SpineAssist minimizes the risk of working free-hand in sensitive regions of the spine. It also reduces surgery time, expedites recovery and minimizes associated risks of traditional spinal surgery.

Jerusalem reservoir found

A 2,000-year-old water reservoir was discovered in Jerusalem. The Pool of Siloam was uncovered in the neighbourhood of Silwan during infrastructure work for a new sewage pipe, the Israel Antiquities Authority announced last week. Archeologists say Jerusalem residents used the pool in ancient times to gather water for their homes, and possibly as a mikvah. Archeologists continue to excavate the area.

Israeli coalition talks seen

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is expected to hold coalition talks with the Labor party in coming weeks. The Sharon government is under pressure after the National Religious Party said it could quit in three months to protest the planned Gaza withdrawal.

Amman U in Israel?

Representatives of Jordan's Al-Ahliyya Amman University met with Education Minister Limor Livnat recently for talks on opening an extension of the school in Israel. The university's director and owner, Maher Hurani, told Livnat he was determined to establish ties with Israel despite threats and opposition voiced against the move in the Arab world and Jordan.

Sharon faces tough political challenges on Gaza

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

It has been watered down to placate senior cabinet ministers and keep the National Religious Party in the governing coalition.

But Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to disengage from the Palestinians, even in the form that passed in cabinet last week, is potentially of historic significance.

There's no escaping the fact that a right-wing, Likud-led government voted to launch a process that will see Israeli troops and civilians leave the Gaza Strip by the end of 2005 and will draw new lines in the West Bank, creating promising conditions for the vision of two states for two peoples.

Analysis

Moreover, the chances for implementation seem good: the United States and the other members of the diplomatic "Quartet" working for Middle East peace back the withdrawal plan.

More importantly, Egypt, the Arab country with most leverage on the Palestinians, has thrown its weight behind it and is ready to take practical steps to help.

But there's a major snag: Despite his impressive victory in cabinet, it's not yet clear whether Sharon has the political clout to see the plan through. He fired two dissenting ministers from the National Union party, Avigdor Lieberman and Benny Elon, to ensure a majority in cabinet, but that only exacerbated strong far-right ferment against the plan.

Two of the six legislators from the hawkish NRP quit his coalition last week, and at least 12 of the Likud party's 40 Knesset members are threatening to vote against the government on key issues.

Indeed, because of the internal opposition within his own Likud Party, Sharon may not be able to muster a Knesset majority for an alternative coalition with the Labor Party. That could trigger elections and a new political landscape in Israel.

Sharon may have most of the international community behind him. But watering down the plan – as he was forced to do after Likud members rejected it in a party referendum last month – has only postponed a major political showdown in Israel, and it's not clear for how long.

The revised disengagement plan approved by cabinet differs from Sharon's original program in that the settlements are to be evacuated in stages, with a cabinet vote before each stage.

The text explicitly states that the cabinet decision does not sanction the evacuation of a single settlement, but it does divide the settlements earmarked for evacuation into four groups, while establishing committees to plan relocation and compensation for evacuated settlers and setting a March 1 deadline for a vote on evacuating the first group.

That was enough for the Quartet to welcome the revised plan, and for the United States to describe it as "historic" and "courageous."

But the key outside player, it seems, will be Egypt. The Egyptians fear that if Israel withdraws unilaterally from Gaza without an orderly transfer of power, the strip could become a hotbed of Islamic fundamentalism, with dangerous consequences for Egypt as well as for Israel.

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, dedicated to the overthrow of the Egyptian regime, assassinated one of the country's last three presidents – Anwar Sadat – and tried to kill the other two, Gamel Abdel Nasser and Hosni Mubarak.

The last thing Mubarak wants is for Gaza to become a base for political subversion against Egypt. The Egyptians therefore are doing all they can to broker a smooth handover of power to the Palestinian Authority and to give it the tools to keep Hamas and Islamic Jihad at bay.

The Egyptians are proposing a number of far-reaching security and political moves that could give Sharon's plan the impetus it needs to succeed.

In the security sphere, they are ready to train PA forces in day-to-day police work and in fighting terrorism and ready to oversee the restructuring of the PA armed forces into three services under a unified command.

In return, Israel would stop targeted killings and other counterterrorist actions as part of a new ceasefire. In addition, the Egyptians would send more forces to the border to prevent arms smuggling into Gaza.

On the political level, the Egyptians are pressing PA President Yasser Arafat on the assumption that if he relinquishes power, peace talks with Israel can resume.

Therefore, Egypt insists that the commander of the unified Palestinian force be someone other than Arafat, that Arafat hand over most of his authority to PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and that a strongman they feel they can work with, perhaps former security chief Mohamed Dahlan, take responsibility for Gaza security.

The Egyptians have given Arafat a June 15 deadline to agree to their terms, and Egyptian officials told Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom during his visit to Cairo last week that they would not tolerate Arafat "playing games" any longer.

But the potential for progress could be undermined by Sharon's domestic difficulties. A looming split in the NRP – party leaders Effi Eitam and Yitzhak Levy resigned from the government last week – coupled with Knesset opposition from the 12 rebel Likud legislators leaves Sharon without a reliable parliamentary majority.

His obvious recourse is to bring Labor's 21 legislators into the coalition, but that's easier said than done. Six Labor legislators are against joining Sharon's government. Their supporters say Sharon has a solid majority of 66 legislators in the 120-member Knesset who don't want Labor to join.

For the time being, Sharon can rely on Labor's promised parliamentary "safety net" – its pledge not to bring him down as long as disengagement goes forward.

But that might not be enough when the vote on evacuating the first group of settlements comes along, and right-wing pressures inside the cabinet resurface. To push the vote through then, Sharon will want Labor in cabinet.

In the weeks and months ahead, Sharon and his old friend, Labor leader Shimon Peres, will use all their political skills to outmanoeuvre the many opponents of a unity government. The future of the disengagement plan could depend on their success.

Healthy eating means knowing what to avoid

Many of my clients work very hard to achieve a sense of health and well-being. But sometimes they make the mistake of focusing only on one particular area, with the result that they ignore the more critical component(s) of what may be ailing them. I tend to coach my clients using a holistic approach towards health.

If, for example, a client who is feeling sluggish and lacking energy begins to practise yoga, she would be making an important head start. However, she would make far more headway if she also evaluates her eating habits and takes on some regular aerobic exercise.

Although I am not a dietitian, in my work as a fitness coach, I have learned about nutrition. In addition to teaching yoga and fitness strategies, I feel compelled to encourage my clients to also consider their eating patterns, because numerous studies have shown that what we eat has a direct impact on how we feel. Ignoring this important aspect might restrict the level of success in achieving our health goals.

In my previous article, I referred to the fact that there are numerous toxins in our environment that impact our sense of well-being, and that "overload" our system's incredible ability to detoxify naturally.

Unfortunately, in our fast-paced North American society, we rely on and consume many ready-made "convenience foods" that often contain empty calories. This is confirmed by taking note of the variety of such foods offered on the grocery shelves of our favourite supermarkets. A vicious circle begins when we introduce these "toxic" foods into our diets (i.e. nutrient-stripped, unhealthful foods that literally have a toxic effect on our bodies when we ingest them). The more we consume these foods, the more we crave them.

It is important to eat "supportive nutrition" – simple, pure foods that are similar to those eaten by our ancestors. Our main focus should be on eating whole foods, that is, foods that have not been processed or that have only been minimally processed. Examples of such foods are organic fruits and vegetables, and whole grain breads, crackers and cereals (where the flour has not been bleached or stripped of fibre).

When we consume mostly whole foods, our cells will detoxify naturally and efficiently, leaving us with a greater sense of energy and vitality. When our body is balanced and healthy as a result of proper eating habits, we are far less inclined to crave unhealthful foods.

There are two categories of foods to keep in mind when choosing an eating plan – those we need to eliminate from our diet, and those that should be added. Over time, the second list will become our main focus.

Here are suggestions of things to eliminate:
- hydrogenated fats (such as most margarines, and as found in most packaged foods);
- deep fried and barbecued foods;
- refined salt;
- soda pop (made with sugar or artificial sweeteners);
- table sugar, white bread, luncheon meats, TV dinners (all of these foods are highly processed);
- food additives such as MSG, artificial sweeteners, chemical preservatives, flavourings and food dyes;
- caffeinated drinks;
- fruits and vegetables that have been sprayed, waxed or dyed;
- empty calorie, non-nutritious foods.

Foods to include are:
- fresh, organic produce;
- herbal teas;
- whole grains;
- natural sea salt;
- unrefined oils, such as flax or olive oil;
- pure, clean water;
- organic herbs and spices;
- other healthy condiments to enhance flavours such as fresh salsas, garlic, lemon, raw apple cider vinegar;
- unprocessed foods in their natural state.

Research has shown that our susceptibility to disease is directly related to our ability to detoxify. When our body is overloaded with toxins, our immune system is challenged, thereby resulting in more frequent colds, allergic reactions, other short-term problems, and long-term disease.

To the best of our ability, we must be proactive rather than merely reactive when it comes to maintaining our health. By being more aware of the prevalence of toxins, and even if we only take gradual steps to change our food choices, we will notice positive effects on how we feel. As we progress further with eliminating our exposure to toxins, the drain on our body's resources will be reduced, and we will experience greater energy, a brighter outlook and a higher quality of living!

STUDENTS REMEMBER CHILD VICTIMS OF HOLOCAUST: Grade 6 students from Ventura Park Public School in Thornhill came to Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care June 8 to launch a multi-media package they created to remember child victims of the Holocaust. "Every Life Remembered" includes an original song by the students, stories, art, drama and a documentary video. The students chose the symbol of a child's shoe to represent their journey of discovery and their wish that such a massive atrocity against humanity will never be repeated. Child Holocaust survivors worked with the children on the project, sharing stories about their personal experiences. For many students, this living history was their first exposure to the Holocaust. The multi-media package will be sent to schools, libraries and homes. It is available from Ventura Park, 905-707-6488. In the photo, from left, are child survivor Joe Gottdenker, Ventura Park students Alexa and Josh holding tiny shoes to represent the memory of children who perished, and social worker Paula David, Baycrest's Holocaust resource project co-ordinator.

NATIONAL GALLERY DRAWS BRONFMAN DONATION

Marjorie Bronfman has donated $350,000 to the National Gallery to establish the Marjorie and Gerald Bronfman Drawing Acquisition Endowment Fund.

The Gallery has already begun using the fund to expand its treasured collection of drawings by European old masters. It recently acquired two major drawings by Giovanni Paolo Panini and Gottfried Bernhard Goz.

"It is the simplicity of the artist's first creative efforts that I find so interesting," said Bronfman, a longtime admirer of drawings. "Drawings reflect the very first inspiration."

The Montreal philanthropist also recently donated two magnificent drawings by Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo from her own collection. The pair are part of an exhibition on Italian Neoclassical drawings on view at the National Gallery until Aug. 22.

"I believe that the Gallery shares my love and fascination for the relatively little-known art form that is drawing," she said.

Names in the News: Violinist extraordinaire Nikolaj Znaider made his debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra by performing three concerts earlier this month. Born in Denmark in 1975 to Polish-Israeli parents, the acclaimed fiddler performed the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto and works by Glinka and Vaughan Williams. The concerts were recorded by CBC Radio 2 for future broadcast… Toronto native Russell Bennett, now a Vancouverite, produced and directed a documentary about Canada's cannibis laws that appeared on CBC Newsworld in 1998, and the topic is evidently still in his bloodstream. The non-practising lawyer has co-written a new comedy, The Reefer Man, which "came out of my desire to create an intelligent comedy with a pro-marijuana theme." He performs it at the Fringe Festival in Toronto in early July. Warning: latecomers "will be rolled and smoked" (www.fringetoronto. com)… Jerusalem-born dancer Avinoam Silverman has been promoted from corps de ballet to second soloist in the National Ballet of Canada… Toronto stage hypnotist The Incredible Boris is taping a TV show for the Fox network this month in Las Vegas. While in the world's high-watt capital, the real-life Boris Cherniak has been using his powers of suggestion at several venues to see if they'd let him stage his own live show… While we're on the subject, mentalist Haim Goldenberg performs his "funny, unusual, extraordinary, breathtaking, high-energetic, sophisticated, exciting and unforgettable" show, "Voyage to Your Mind," at the Laugh Resort, Holiday Inn Hotel, 370 King St. W. on Sunday, June 20, 7:30 p.m. (416-446-1250, www.HaimG. com)

Explosive Documentary: Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici and others in association with the CBC have produced Impact of Terror, a powerful documentary about a horrific terrorist incident that occurred in Israel in August 2001.

Walking into a busy Jerusalem pizzeria with a guitar packed with explosives, a young man blew himself up, killing 15 people and injuring more than 100. The victims were Jews and Arabs, young and old. Through personal stories from survivors and families of the dead, the documentary presents the lasting and profound impact of this horrifying event.

On CBC Witness, Wednesday, June 16, 8 p.m. On CBC Newsworld, June 19, 7 and 11 p.m.

Fringe Drama: Swimming Lessons With Paisley Kite is a multi-disciplinary one-woman show that follows wanna-be punk rocker Nina Finkleman as she escapes from a free trip to Israel to learn about science and religion on her own. She's a "16-year-old protagonist with a chip on her shoulder the size of the Wailing Wall."

Written and performed by Emily Pearlman, this Fringe Festival offering is on stage this week in Ottawa and from June 30 to July 6 in Toronto. www.crosscountrytrampoline.ca/.

STEP LIVELY AT A DANCE FESTIVAL IN THE GALIL AND A JAZZ FESTIVAL IN EILAT

Herewith, news of two major international arts festivals in Israel, the first focusing on dance and the second on jazz, but both guaranteed to offer some memorable syncopated moments.

The 17th annual Karmiel Dance Festival offers three days of music and dance in Karmiel, a town known as the Gateway to the Galilee. More than 250,000 people are expected to attend the festival, which runs July 13 to 15.

Israeli folk dancing is the festival's trademark, but all types of dance may be found on its stages, including modern ballet, ballroom and folklore dancing from around the world. During the festival, Karmiel, with its cool mountain air and breathtaking landscape, is transformed from a quiet city into an international dance theater.

The festival showcases dozens of performances and events. Highlights include three central performances in a large amphitheater and public dances at night, during which the choreographers and dancers interact with the audience. For details, visit the website www.dancefest.karmiel.israel.net/about fest.html.

If you're still in the mood for lively and exotic syncopation, head for the 17th annual Red Sea Jazz Festival in Eilat, August 25 to 28. The event features more than 30 major acts and is expected to attract more than 70,000 international visitors.

As if its sunny beaches, sparkling blue waters and exotic night life weren't enough, Eilat has the added attraction of hosting this major jazz event each year. This summer's roster includes internationally acclaimed jazz bands and artists such as the Charles Lloyd Quartet, The Bad Plus and Russell Gunn Ethnomusicology from the United States. Details at www.ejn.it/promo/redsea.htm.

Jewish History in Saint John, N.B.: The Saint John Jewish Historical Museum recently opened for its 19th summer season with several new exhibits. "Creating a Community: Jewish Immigration to Saint John, 1858-1930" includes photographs of immigrants and the artifacts they brought, while "The Davis-Rozovsky Family" includes many family photographs. The work of some local high-school students on the Holocaust is also displayed. Until October 29. E-mail sjjhm@nbnet.nb.ca.

Picasso Curtain at National Gallery: "The Great Parade: Portrait of the Artist as Clown," an exhibition that opens at Ottawa's National Gallery on June 25, looks at the circus through the eyes of artists such as Degas, Toulouse-Lautrec, Rouault, Chagall and Leger. More than 175 paintings, sculptures, photographs and videos reveal the reality and even the tragedy behind circus performers' comic faces and dazzling costumes.

A highlight of the exhibition is an immense stage curtain painted by Pablo Picasso as a backdrop for the modernist ballet Parade in 1917. The spectacular curtain is too large to be hung in most museums and has never been shown before in Canada. The exhibition continues until Sept. 19.

Artists demonstrate the value of recycling trash

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Alina Lloyd used a discarded office door as a canvas on which she painted a striking image of red and orange swirls.

Elizabeth Greisman created a landscape on a piece of Plexiglas taken out of the garbage.

While these Jewish women may sound like starving artists who can't afford "real" art materials, there is a method to their "fitter" madness. By turning trash into vibrant works of art, they're trying to illustrate that waste is valuable.

The works were created for the RecycleArt Project, which was conceived by Lloyd and sponsored by Public Works and Government Services Canada.

Along with providing environmental education, the project aims to divert government office waste and in the process, produce radiant paintings.

Nearly 40 RecycleArt Project works were showcased recently in the lobby of the Joseph Sheppard Building at Yonge Street and Sheppard Avenue in Toronto, as part of National Environment Week.

"The biggest impact this project is meant to produce is the change in people's thinking," says Lloyd, 40, a Toronto painter and portfolio manager with Brookfield LePage Johnson Controls, which manages Public Works properties.

"It's the paradigm shift that this is not just a pile of rubble; there is some value in it."

While many Canadians eagerly recycle, Lloyd's contentention that waste has a stigma of uselessness still has merit.

Close to 90 per cent of the items we toss in the garbage could be recycled, reused or composted. More than half the waste we produce in our homes piles up in landfill sites.

That was the picture Lloyd painted for Public Works when she proposed the project.

Public Works provided Lloyd with a vacant office in the Sheppard building to use as a studio. The department also supplied a treasure-trove of junk from government facilities that would otherwise have been hauled off to landfill sites.

The studio, on the top floor of the building, has become an oasis for government employees seeking refuge from computers and cubicles.

One of almost 40 works of "recycled" artwork showcased recently.

Public Works architect Elisabeth Ohi says she "wanted to jump in and make some [art]" after she toured the studio.

"I think the RecycleArt project can turn people's minds around and make them realize that waste… is a resource."

That may sound idealistic, but Lloyd says the spin-offs are already being realized.

"There is awareness and education coming out of this," she says, noting everyone from construction project managers to bureaucrats has marvelled at the finished works and shown a new appreciation for waste.

To augment her works, Lloyd put out a call for artists, and Toronto visual artist/art teacher Elizabeth Greisman was selected.

"What was new to me on this project was the Plexiglas," says Greisman.

"I was looking for two-dimensional surfaces that could be painted over and Plexiglas has the added trait of being transparent."

Greisman's folksy paintings all have environment-related themes.

Her nature piece illustrates a skyscape, using colourful strokes of blue and green, tinged with white and fading purple.

For her "O'Canada Series," Greisman adorned discarded office chairs and garbage cans with pink flowers and the names of Canadian provinces and domestic trees.

"The images I create help us appreciate the environment," she says.

"I want the public to not only see this as a picture of flowers and that it is made out of something discarded, but I want to make them think and consider other options [for waste]."

Lloyd's ethereal paintings are based on the four-elements theme of water, fire, earth and air.

Along with paint, she used gravel, lead and plaster of paris to add a diversity of textures.

"What we were trying to accomplish was that people don't look at it and say, 'Ick, this feels like garbage,'" Lloyd says. "It has to make you want to touch it."

While some of the materials didn't always co-operate with acrylic paints, Lloyd says she would take recycled materials over standard art canvasses any day. "I find blank canvasses and expensive pieces of paper to be very stifling.

"When you paint on something that has history… it becomes a medium for telling the story."

Lloyd hopes this is only the beginning of the RecycleArt story "This is just a pilot project. If it can work here, it can work anywhere," she says.

"Every building with vacant space in Toronto should do this."

Lloyd is eyeing a revitalized Toronto waterfront as a possible display location for more recycled art.

'Soap opera' based on A.B. Yehoshua novel

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to the CJN

Israeli films are always difficult to find in local video stores. Even places that specialize in foreign films carry very few Israeli films.

But two Israeli films were recently released on video and DVD and are available at some stores or by telephone or on the Internet.

Return From India is a relatively recent film – it was produced in 2002 – directed by Menachem Golan. It is a soap opera featuring Aki Avni, one of Israel's hottest film stars, who some readers will remember from the popular film Time of Favor.

In Return From India, an Israeli young woman has fallen ill in India. Fearing for her well-being, the girl's parents organize a rescue mission. They hire a young Israeli doctor and make their way to an isolated Indian town where they find the girl, diagnose her condition and bring her home to Israel. for more advanced treatment. In the meantime, the young doctor enters into a steamy affair with the girl's mother.

The results threaten everyone involved, but especially the doctor's career.

The film is based on a best-selling novel by A.B. Yehoshua and was filmed in both English and Hebrew. As a result, viewers have a choice of which version they wish to see, as well as being able to watch it in Hebrew with optional English subtitles.

This film can be obtained through Video Service Corporation at 416-597-8325 or 1-877-341-7577 or by e-mailing the company at vidserv@globalserve.net.

The second new release is Kedma, which was directed by Amos Gitai. This film was an official selection at the 2002 Cannes Film Festival and looks at a group of Jewish refugees who arrive in Palestine in 1948 aboard a freighter called The Kedma. Upon landing, the refugees are captured in a British army ambush, but escape and are later recruited to defend their new homeland.

Gitai's point of view may not be one we all agree with, but he does provide a thought-provoking film of a period of Israeli history that does not receive much attention these days.

Kedma is distributed by Kino on Video and if not available at local video stores, may be ordered online through www.amazon.ca.

Arab world incubator of anti-Semitism, author says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"Hitlerism is alive and well in the Arab world," according to American journalist and author Ron Rosenbaum, the editor of a newly published book of essays about contemporary anti-Semitism.

Arab hatred for Israel and Jews, in certain crucial ways, is far worse than than the age-old venom that preceded and facilitated the Holocaust, he claims.

In Toronto to promote Those Who Forget: The Question of Anti-Semitism (Random House Canada), Rosenbaum said that while the Nazis persecuted and exterminated Jews, they took special care to try to conceal their unprecedented crimes against humanity.

Hitler did not advertise or boast about the Holocaust. And thus, in a perverse sense, he was the first Holocaust denier, observed Rosenbaum, whose previous work was Explaining Hitler.

By contrast, some Arab clerics, writers and intellectuals publicly celebrate the Nazi genocide, while others openly call for the mass murder of Jews, he noted in an interview.

"Today in the Middle East, the murder of Jews by a suicide bomber is marked by parties for the families who receive blood-money bonuses for their child's hideous act," he writes in Those Who Forget. "It is not just an individual act of fanaticism spurred on by the false promise of paradise, it is a practice backed by an entire culture."

Rosenbaum argues that the beheading of American newspaper correspondent Daniel Pearl in Pakistan– to whom he dedicates his book and with whom he completely identifies as a journalist and a Jew – was symptomatic of the deep-seated animosity toward Jews in the Muslim world.

"Look at the shameless videotape of his murder, in which he was forced to say his father was Jewish. It was something different, a step beyond even Hitler's hatred. Pearl's death told us we're dealing with people who are proud of advertising the murder of Jews."

Arab anti-Semitism is aggravated both by Western anti-Jewish myths and European fascist beliefs, Rosenbaum said.

But he has reached no definitive conclusions about the role of Islamic theology in fostering anti-Semitism.

"There is a disagreement among Qur'anic scholars as to how hostile the Qur'an is to Jews. One can disagree whether the Qur'an is intrinsically anti-Semitic."

He has no doubts, however, that hate-filled portrayals of Israel in the Arab media inflame anti-Semitism throughout the Arab world.

The malicious rumour that the destruction of the World Trade Center in on Sept. 11, 2001 was planned and executed by Israel's Mossad intelligence agency is an example of the anti-Semitic paranoia that pervades the minds of Arabs in particular and Muslims in general, Rosenbaum said.

"Tens of millions of people in the Middle East, and in Pakistan, believe this totally false and ridiculous rumour. There is a willingness to blame Jews for any tragedy."

The continuing Arab-Israeli dispute is a factor in the spread of anti-Semitism. "If it magically went away, certainly things would be better," he said.

But radical Islam, which rejects the very idea of a Jewish state, would still be a problem for Israel even if peace were to prevail, Rosenbaum added.

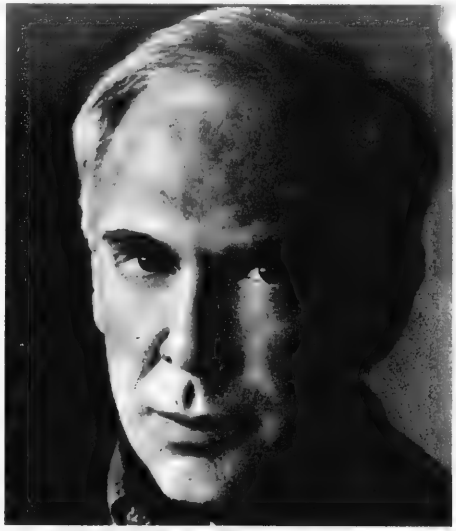
In line with this argument, he said that Muslims potentially threaten Israel's very existence.

The threat, in part, is posed by Muslim nations that have either acquired an atomic capability (Pakistan) or are trying to build a nuclear arsenal (Iran).

Rosenbaum said incendiary comments by Iran's former president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, are indicative of the state of Muslim public opinion. In remarks on Teheran Radio, he declared, "One atomic bomb would wipe out Israel without trace, while the Islamic world would only be damaged rather than destroyed by Israeli nuclear retaliation."

Appalled by Rafsanjani's statement, Rosenbaum said, "He said that with a kind of frightening complacency."

In his view, Israel is also threatened by fanatical Muslims. As he put it, "A terrorist can bring a nuclear device to Israel and set it off."



Ron Rosenbaum

Although Rosenbaum thinks that Israel's conflict with the Palestinians should be resolved by political means, he is no longer certain that the current Palestinian leadership genuinely accepts the presence of a Jewish state.

"I want to believe in the possibility of a two-state solution, but the events of the past few years don't give me hope it will end the problem or the peril," said Rosenbaum, who sounds like a disillusioned liberal.

"I was hopeful when [former Israeli prime minister Ehud] Barak offered 95 per cent of the West Bank to the Palestinians. But they walked away without a counter-offer, and the second intifadah, with its suicide bombers, began. I don't have any confidence that the Palestinian Authority has accepted the right of Israel to exist."

Rosenbaum believes the PA's support of a two-state solution masks a desire to destroy Israel through stealth.

"I don't see that concessions by Israel have worked. Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon may have triggered the intifadah. The lesson of Lebanon is clear: killing Jews works."

Criticism of Israeli policies is perfectly legitimate, he said, "but to criticize the right of Israel to exist or to defend itself is sophistry that ends up as anti-Semitism."

Quoting Lawrence Summers, the president of Harvard University, Rosenbaum said that anti-Zionist sentiments, slogans and marches are anti-Semitic in their effect if not in their intent.

"The anti-Semitism in which Israel's destruction is the issue is the new anti-Semitism."

The Internet is the latest frontier of anti-Semitism, the longest hatred. "It's out there and will be out there forever."

Anti-Semitic sites on the Web are disturbing, but Rosenbaum, a civil libertarian, stops short of calling for their suppression.

"I'm not so sure a legal approach would be effective. One would hope that people will recognize the hatred and stupidity of these sites. But there will always be people who won't."

The existentialist jazz player

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When a jazz pianist cites Jean-Paul Sartre, you listen. It isn't every day you hear jazz musicianship compared to French existentialism.

"Sartre's autobiography was split into two sections, 'Reading' and 'Writing,'" says Ron Davis. "I'm at the 'Writing' stage now. I feel the need to produce."

Ron Davis, right, with the Ron Davis Trio.

Davis, 47, speaks through his ivory-tickling fingers, but listening to him explain his musical motives is like sitting in on a lecture full of life-affirming messages.

In an interview at Toronto's Free Times Café, I'm not surprised to learn Davis has gone the lecture route many times in the past, wearing several hats: he practised law for two years, was a French professor at the University of Toronto and recently spoke at Meiji University in Tokyo on "Multiculturalism and the Golden Age of Jazz in Toronto."

But most of his writing passion has focused on jazz, and if the latest release is any indication, his songs turn a black-and-white tradition into a colourful mosaic.

Mungle Music is the third CD from the Toronto pianist, and Davis says this time the tunes are more exploratory, while still keeping the integrity of his old-school style.

"My first album, soloduotrio, was an all-you-can-eat buffet of styles," he says, "but in Mungle Music, my trio brings depth and energy, while I bring my Oscar Peterson-wannabe melodic-based style."

Peterson is just one of those who have influenced Davis. Art Tatum is another, which fits with Davis's dedication to swing, a 1930s-era style characterized by accenting the third and fourth beats. To the casual listener, Mungle Music's swinging moments entertain with that toe-tapping rhythm jazz fans have come to love.

The fans are not the only ones having fun. "Every time I go to work I go to play," says Davis, smiling widely and sipping espresso.

Davis throws himself into his compositions, eschewing pop-song blandness. "I believe in every note I play," he says, adding that a performance makes him a "live wire, really getting into the music."

So involved is Davis that he cried when he first heard his own tender solo on Down By.

"Maybe I was channelling my zaidie's sad energy with that solo, because it was filled with so much pathos," he says.

That kind of emotional sacrifice is necessary, he believes, because after you record a song, "there should be blood on the floor. Part of you is in that creation of music."

His devotion has paid off. Besides performing regularly at jazz clubs, corporate events and simchahs, Davis will hit the stage at the Toronto Downtown Jazz Festival from June 26 to 29. One of the gigs is a session at Nathan Phillips Square – the free event features the Ron Davis Downtown Swingsters, acknowledging the origins of jazz.

"I'm a minority, because the prevailing jazz soundscape is rooted from Miles Davis's Kind of Blue up to Dave Brubeck," Davis says. "My soundscape is different – late '30s to late '50s."

Has his Jewish heritage influenced his swinging tunes?

He veers off-track, describing his upbringing – "I had an Orthodox father, payes, tzitzis and all" – and private schooling at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He then returns to the question. "Oh yeah, my music is informed by all outside factors, including Judaism. It may not be overt, but I've done klezmer and felt very comfortable there."

Davis has also felt at home playing at bar mitzvahs and weddings. For a full-time musician, the private gigs help put the challah on the table.

"I'm always available for any simchah," he says.

Ron Davis performs free at the Toronto Downtown Jazz Festival on June 26 at Nathan Phillips Square; on June 28 at Trader's Bar and Grill, 123 Queen St. W.; on June 29, at the Rex Jazz and Blues Bar, 194 Queen St. W.

He will play an Adath Israel singles swing dance Aug. 29.

Gymnast has high hopes to make Athens Olympics

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

With a lack of depth in Canadian artistic gymnastics, it shouldn't come as a major shock if Unionville's 16-year-old Marci Bernholtz qualifies for this summer's Olympic Games in Athens.

Having just become age-eligible, the reigning Elite Ontario provincial champion is determined to make the most of a unique opportunity.

Following the recently concluded National Championships at the Hershey Centre in Mississauga, Bernholtz is only one step away from a trip to Greece.

She finished ninth overall among 26 competitors and was one of 10 athletes to advance to the second set of trials for the Canadian team, which will be held from July 12 to July 19 at Seneca College in Toronto. Six athletes and two alternates will be selected for the team following that event.

Bernholtz's best performance at the Nationals was in the floor exercises, where she won a bronze medal.

Speaking prior to the Nationals, her longtime coach Paul Johnson said, "We're not expecting her to be right up there on the team. We're also not expecting her not to squeak in either.

"She's on the rise. Her performance up to now shows she's one of the best in Canada. I think the main focus we want is for her to be invited to the second trials, and that will be an incredible learning experience."

Bernholtz, a Grade 10 student at Thornhill Secondary School, recently returned from Luxembourg where she competed in the FL Gym Open, her first major overseas international meet. She finished fourth overall going up against America's best as well as a number of top Europeans.

Bernholtz made all four event finals, winning gold on the balance beam, silver for her floor exercise routine, with fourth place finishes on bars and the vault. Her 9.313 score on beam put her ahead of U.S. Olympic team contenders Marcia Newby and Liz Tricase, who scored 9.138 and 9.063, respectively. Bernholtz also won a silver for her floor exercise routine, scoring a 9.250 to finish behind Newby, who earned 9.625 for the gold.

A three-year member of the national team, Bernholtz also represented Canada in a dual competition with Japan at the Jurassic Classic in Calgary in March. She took home silver in the all around, making three event finals.

Bernholtz says having a pretty good meet in Calgary was a big confidence booster in getting ready for Luxembourg and what awaits in the coming weeks.

"I'm very excited about the Olympic trials," she says. "I think just going through trials like that will be something in itself."

Bernholtz describes herself as a powerful rather than a graceful and flexible gymnast. At 5-1 and 105 pounds, her favourite event, floor, has always been a little bit easier on her.

A three-time recipient of the Town of Richmond Hill award,

Marci Bernholtz

Bernholtz was honoured this year with the Kate Richardson Pursuit of Excellence Award for her hard work and dedication to the sport.

She trains at Richmond Hill's Academy of Sport and Fitness six days a week for five to six hours at a time. Her regimen includes physical maintenance therapy in the gym, dance and fitness training, plus work on the four events.

Johnson, who owns the academy, has high hopes for Bernholtz, who he has coached since she was six and has gotten very close to over the years.

"She's very focused and dedicated, almost too hard on herself, if anything," said Johnson. "She's a very, very intense young lady. She has goals and she goes after them."

Bernholtz hopes to compete in next year's world championships, as well as the Maccabiah Games in Israel. Looking ahead to 2006, Bernholtz has her sights on the Pan Am and Commonwealth Games.

Don't be surprised to see her there.

Bronze is beautiful for Israeli sailors

By RAMI HIPSH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israeli sailors Vered Buskila and Nika Kornitzky last week won a bronze medal at the 470 Class European Sailing Championship.

Buskila and Kornitzky began the final day's three races in third place. They finished fifth in the first race and then a disappointing 20th in the second, with the battle to hold on to third overall being waged against a duo from France. The Israelis finished sixth in the last race of the day and held on to claim the bronze.

The European Championship medal comes less than a month after the two finished third at the World Championship in Croatia and shows the duo has returned to the top level of competitive sailing. They won a bronze medal at the European Championship in 2001 and then put in average performances in 2003.

Buskila and Kornitzky will compete for Israel at the Olympic Games later this summer.

Maccabi fastpitch tryouts announced

Regional tryouts for the Maccabi fastpitch softball team will be held in coming weeks, with a national tryout scheduled for the Canada Day long weekend.

Successful ballplayers will represent Maccabi Canada at the 17th Maccabiah Games in Israel, which will run from July 11 to July 21, 2005.

Quebec regional tryouts will be held the weekend of June 19 at Centennial Park in Cote-St.-Luc.

Ontario regional tryouts are scheduled for the weekend of June 26 at Clanton Park in Toronto.

National tryouts will be held from July 1 to July 4 at Clanton Park in Toronto.

Interested athletes should contact David Fabian at 416-932-6250 or Warren Cohen at 514-973-3242 for details.

The New York party season

The time for writing resumés, going to job interviews and hunting for apartments has arrived for me and for my fellow AVODAHniks in the Jewish Service Corps program.

There are a few fun things to help distract us from this stressful transitional time, with the events held during New York City's party and benefit season at the top of the list.

By ELISHEVA GOULD

Last week, I attended three benefit dinners in a row. Each reflected the scope and philosophy of the organizations they were supporting.

The first dinner was for Sanctuary for Families (SOF), which provides legal and other aid to victims of domestic violence, including the most vulnerable in that group, undocumented immigrants.

SOF's annual "Zero Tolerance" event was held at a large banquet hall. It included live musical performances by well-known musicians and DJs, fancy and expensive food, an auction of luxurious items, door prizes and a high-powered guest list. We attended this glamorous event because we had done volunteer work. It was exciting to see who turned out to support our workplaces.

Holy Apostles, the church at which my weekly outreach legal clinic is held, was the site of another function. The intimate and modest reception at the church was held in honour of its dedicated counselling staff, who help some of the poorest people struggling to get by on the city's streets and in the shelter system. Located in Manhattan's Chelsea neighbourhood, Holy Apostles feeds more than 1,000 homeless people each week.

AVODAH's first fundraising dinner was to honour two rabbis – Michael Strassfeld and Joy Levitt, who both do a great deal of tikkun olam work.

At the dinner, this year's AVODAH members hobnobbed with the program's growing alumni community. Soon we will be graduates of Year 6. We schmoozed with members of the New York Jewish community and spoke to those who support AVODAH. Glowing introductions, moving speeches, live jazz and delicious kosher food were the event's other highlights.

Suitably, given AVODAH's mission and values, the dinner was held at the top of the Times Square Hotel, a housing facility and social service agency for formerly homeless adults.

On a smaller scale, the nice weather has brought people out of hibernation and neighbourhoods are alive with block parties, roof soirées and goodbye get-togethers.

Recently, my colleague Sheila, a member of the Jesuit Volunteer Corps – a program for Catholic youth that is almost identical to AVODAH – threw a roof party and invited all of our co-workers from the Urban Justice Center. Her housemates brought colleagues from each of their non-profit organizations. The party was a fun, socially conscious gathering of service-minded individuals.

Meanwhile, we have begun to receive Jewish Service Corps alumni event invitations. I am both frightened and excited by the invitations as they make me aware of how soon my year in AVODAH will end, while I realize that I have people with whom to commiserate, to network and to maintain friendships with in the future.

It is times like these that remind me that I'm building a community, not only with my housemates and fellow young Jewish professionals, but also with public-interest lawyers, caseworkers from anti-poverty organizations and other caring people who spend their time working toward positive social change.

One of the major goals of AVODAH is to be far-sighted and far-reaching. This is not just a year-long service corps program, but one that also helps its participants find their niches in the world of Jewish social justice advocacy, in the non-profit sector, in political activism and in philanthropy. I already sense that my introduction into this world is helping me use my intellect, skills and compassion to do what I love, while improving individual lives and the world.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Something happened recently that absolutely infuriated me. I was breastfeeding my 6-week-old baby daughter in the corner booth of a downtown cafeteria. I was being very discreet, having worn a big sweatshirt and jacket because I knew I would be breastfeeding at some point that morning. An older woman approached me and told me there are more appropriate places for me to feed and said that if I didn't stop, she would complain to the manager.

I was so taken aback that I collected all my things and left in tears. But I am no longer upset. I am angry. How dare she!

Yet, I think I handled the situation very poorly. If I had the chance to travel back in time, I would behave quite differently.

What do you think of this incident? Should I have held my ground, or was leaving the right thing to do?

Not Indecent Exposure
Dear Not Indecent Exposure

There are moments in all of our lives that we would love to have the chance to relive. However, since that is impossible, you have to come to terms with the way you handled this situation and learn from it.

Nursing in public often creates strong opinions on both sides. I polled approximately 20 people on their opinions about it and the reactions were mixed. Some felt it should be done only in private, while others felt that if a baby is hungry, he or she should eat wherever the mother feels comfortable.

Here is where I stand: Done discreetly, there is absolutely nothing objectionable about breastfeeding in a public place. Personally, it would make me smile. Nursing a baby is one of the most loving and selfless things a mother can do. You are nourishing and nurturing your child naturally, and for that you should feel proud.

You have to get comfortable in your convictions about breastfeeding in public and prepare yourself – not with anger, but with confidence and knowledge – in case you encounter another incident. Trust yourself that you are doing the very best thing for you and your baby.

Is Jewish suffering inevitable?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Carl Jung, a Swiss-German psychoanalyst, coined the phrase "soul work." He defined it as the development of strength of character through plumbing the torturous, tangled depths and vastness of our own minds.

URBAN WRITER

In the case of the Jewish people, this introspective process would oblige us to explore aspects of our collective consciousness, including how we view our position among the nations and how we think we are seen by the gentile.

Such a process would, no doubt, reveal some very interesting things about the Jewish mindset. One such revelation, I believe, would be the conviction held by most Jews that we are, and always will be, a hated people and religion, and that one day another catastrophe will befall us.

Put another way, if we were to poll the Jewish people and ask them whether they believe the destruction of the Temples, the Spanish Inquisition and the Holocaust were inevitable – perhaps even pre-determined by God – and whether suffering is our lot, most Jews would answer in the affirmative.

If we are then to take our "soul work" to the next step, we would have to ask ourselves if just as the scent of the rose is loved by all who smell it, so too will the Jew be hated and persecuted by all generations, then what is our responsibility as we wait for this looming tragedy?

Should we not view the peace and freedom that the Jewish community of Toronto is currently experiencing as a blip in time and plan for the future by building fortresses to prepare for the worst?

Would it not be wise, knowing that the Righteous Gentile is an anomaly among the nations, for Diaspora Jewry to make aliyah and huddle with our Israeli brothers and sisters, protected by their military might?

If we are indeed powerless, or metaphysically stymied, in our attempts to adjust this divine plan, should we not consider the relevance of traditional and common prayers such as O'seh shalom b'imromav, in which we ask God to bring peace to us and all of Israel?

Or is there another possibility?

Maybe there are plenty of gentiles in the world who are not like the biblical Esau – evil and wanting to destroy the Jew. What if we actually dismissed for a moment the inescapability of anti-Semitism and instead – using the wonderful minds of so many Jews and the tools of the communication age – made a gargantuan, thorough and dignified plan to discover and develop friendships and alliances with non-Jews all around us? Could our suffering not be tempered?

A few years ago, a movie starring Bill Murray called Groundhog Day told the story of a man who woke every morning to a day that was exactly like the one before. In it, he relived his miserable existence over and over again and was prevented from reaching his goals, without any hope for the future.

If the Jewish mind holds the belief that no matter what we do, as in Groundhog Day, tomorrow will produce the same persecution of our people as yesterday, have we not, in effect, precluded ourselves from doing everything we can to prevent another catastrophe?

We cannot and should not wait helplessly and hopelessly as anti-Semitism brews in Europe and other parts of the world. If we insist on feeling powerless about our influence on this "social and divine inevitability," aren't we far too committed to the role of victim and, therefore, slipping when it comes to our guardianship of Judaism in our times?

Why is there so little effort to counter this? Where is our "soul work?"

Tribute to ISRAEL

The Colour of the Flag

by David Zvi Epstein

We know how it feels.
We know how it feels to starve for two thousand years to mourn every night for the city we cannot enter for the mountain we cannot climb for the nation we cannot build.
We know what it feels like to win a city and lose a thousand sons.
To live knowing that ten thousand feet are waiting to dance on their graves.
Do we have the courage to say
our nation is worth a life ten lives, a hundred lives, more so that we may pray where our fathers prayed and live where they lived?
What will we say to them?
What will we say to a man, no, a boy!
A boy with a machine gun
A boy who will die before he understands what life means?
Who lies bleeding on a battlefield,
his cheek still warm from his mother's last kiss?
What will we say to him?
When we ask ourselves, what colour most befits this country,
What the colour of our flag shall be
What will we say?
Perhaps we will say red.
Red: the colour of war
The colour of Kalashnikovs and mortar shells and AK-47s.
Of remorselessness and madness.
The colour of a mother closing the door behind her 18-year-old baby, a rifle bouncing awkwardly between his thin shoulder blades.
The colour of smoke over a silent battlefield.
The stickiness of blood and saliva, the crunch of bone against bone, the taste of metal on the tongue.
Perhaps we would say that our flag should be red.
But when Ben-Gurion declared our rebirth
when our brothers reclaimed the Kotel when our tanks and our buses exploded before our eyes, when our dead were lowered into the ground.
they had the audacity to do so beneath a flag of bright blue the colour of our tzitzit
the colour of the sea and the sky and the Throne of God Himself the colour of children's eyes growing bright learning their aleph bet for the first time
the colour of baking challa in erev Shabbat Yerushalayim the colour of the cohanim blessing the people the colour of a mother hugging her son who has returned,
The colour of windows filled with Shabbat candles and tables filled with Torah
The colour of hope.
And to our children's blood that screams out from our soaked ground,
this is what we answer:
There is no amount of red that will make our flag waver,
no amount of red that will make our skies question,
or our seas not fathom,
that we are a nation of brilliant blue and will never, ever change.

'A nation of brilliant blue'

Editorial

The poem on this page by David Zvi Epstein poignantly expresses one of the sustaining truths of Jewish life throughout the ages and of late, especially in the State of Israel. Despite all the travail and hardship, the imperative has always been to go forward, fully believing in the hope and the goodness of the future.

"We are a nation of brilliant blue" resolutely conveys the sense of purpose – and I would add, even optimism – that must permeate our every action in this world.

That is the theme of and main message underlying this Tribute to Israel.

We must think of Israel as more than a land and a people in constant crisis, under constant siege. We must not allow the defining perception of the Jewish state to be that which its enemies have etched into the international consciousness since 1967.

With all its flaws, Israel is still a land flowing with the milk and honey of science, arts, theatre, literature, medicine, creativity and collective commitment in all its glorious and inglorious human manifestations.

The Colour of the Flag* is a perfect complement to the photograph by Yael Baruch from Montreal, which we are also pleased and honoured to publish. It is the winning entry in the Sixth Annual Canada Israel Experience Photo Contest sponsored by EL AL Israel Airlines, ROOTS Canada, The Canadian Jewish News, Canada Israel Experience and UIA Federations Canada. The runner-up photos appear on page 27 of the paper.

We are indeed a nation of brilliant blue and we thank David Zvi Epstein for reminding us.

Our Warmest Wishes to the State of Israel

Tribute to Israel

For Tel Aviv, UNESCO award is an honour and responsibility

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Under the layers of soot, the stucco walls are beginning to crumble and the once-sleek rectangular balconies have peeling walls and battered shutters. Inside, a bicycle is chained to the curved metal railing lining the staircase.

The address is 79 Gordon St., one of hundreds of Bauhaus-inspired buildings that line the streets of Tel Aviv, home to the largest collection of Bauhaus-style buildings in the world. Many, like this 1935 building, are classics of design but are sorely in need of restoration.

In recent years, however, the conservation bug has begun to catch on in Tel Aviv, with hundreds of the city's 4,000 or so Bauhaus-style buildings restored and repaired, painted in gleaming whites and pastels, and returned to their former glory.

On June 6, the "White City" of Tel Aviv was declared a World Heritage Site by the United Nations Education and Cultural Organization, UNESCO. The White City refers to the concentration of Bauhaus-style architecture in and around the city centre.

City officials hope the honour – Tel Aviv is only the second city in the world to be given the title – will give a boost to much needed restoration efforts.

"Tel Aviv is not an ancient city, but now it looks like an old city, and I would like it to look like a new city, fresh and clean, all the wrinkles ironed away," said Danny Kaiser, the city's chief engineer, who is an architect by training.

To make that happen, the city is offering unique incentives to the owners of the buildings to take on the expense of restoring their properties. In exchange for committing themselves to restoration, for example, owners can receive permission to add additional floors to buildings as long as the floors are as "unseen" as possible, blending in with the original structure. Some real estate-related taxes can also be reduced.

"I think people are starting to recognize that it is not a burden but an opportunity," Kaiser said, adding that owners need to see their buildings as precious property worth investing in.

Restoration is ultimately a worthy investment, he said, providing extra income from the creation of new apartments and increased rent because what was once a run-down building will become a highly sought-after property.

The building at 3 Strauss St. has been expertly restored. It now appears as it originally did – a large, cream-coloured edifice with dark red railings and a window running vertically the length of the staircase.

Such windows, dubbed "thermometers" by local architects because you could see people going up and down the stairs, are typical of Tel Aviv's Modern-style buildings.

"You look around and each building could look like this," said Peera Goldman, who heads restoration efforts for the Tel Aviv municipality. She shakes her head and sighs.

The Bauhaus-inspired architecture, more accurately referred to as part of the Modern or International style, reached the country's shores in the early 1930s with the arrival of Jewish architects fleeing Europe.

Many had studied at the top avant-garde architecture schools in Europe, and it was their convergence in Tel Aviv that helped create a synthesis of truly modern architecture in ideology and style, stripped of the heavy ornamentation of the past.

"They created an outstanding architectural ensemble of the Modern Movement in a new cultural context," a UNESCO statement said.

Constructed between 1931 and 1956, the buildings looked somewhat out of place in many parts of the world, with their flat roofs and pastel colors, but here along the Mediterranean coastline, they seemed to find their home.

The City Hall has erected a series of posters and instructional material describing the original Bauhaus buildings. The route has been dubbed the Bauhaus trail.

'The buildings adapted to the culture and climate of the place'

Architects also adapted their designs to suit Tel Aviv's weather and landscape.

The Modernist movement was based on the concept of art in the service of society, striving for architecture that was functional but at the same time aesthetic. It sought to remedy the ills of the Industrial Revolution and concomitant urban poverty, and its emphasis on concepts of utopia and equality fit well with the Zionist ideology in pre-state Palestine.

"The buildings adapted to the culture and climate of the place," Goldman said. "It was a very good integration of the socialist spirit of the Israeli ethos of the time and the ideology of the Modern movement."

Characteristic of the building style are columns and ribbon windows running horizontally. There is experimentation with the idea of volume and a focus on the asymmetrical – similar to Cubist art of the period.

Balconies are often curved and overhung with ledges that provide shade. In an effort to keep interiors cool in humid Tel Aviv, angled skylights and small windows were installed.

UNESCO chose Tel Aviv not only because of the buildings themselves but also for the city's original urban design.

"The new town of Tel Aviv is an outstanding example of new town planning and architecture in the early 20th century, adapted to the requirements of a particular cultural and geographic context," a UNESCO statement said.

Tel Aviv started as a suburb of Jaffa in 1909 with 66 families. The original residents planned a garden city, so the sandy terrain was levelled and a linear garden was planted – the remnant of which can be seen today on languid Rothschild Boulevard – lined with ficus trees.

The garden was envisioned as the heart of the city, a point of social connection.

As the city grew, a Scotsman named Sir Patrick Geddes won the competition to design a city plan. He was moved by Tel Aviv's community feel and he sought to preserve that sense as he planned for the city's northward expansion.

Though his plan was not fully implemented, Geddes' innovative idea – to create green squares tucked away in neighbourhoods between major streets – gives the city a feeling of intimacy even today.

The design allows for residents to live in quiet neighbourhoods but still be close to major, commercial roads.

The underlying plan was "a city that is very informal," Goldman said, a city that fit with the informal lifestyle championed by the early Zionists.

UNESCO's recognition of Tel Aviv stands as a challenge to the city and its residents to protect their urban heritage, officials said.

Kaiser, the city's chief engineer, said he thinks the honour will help keep up the momentum of the conservation movement.

"I hope we are in a new era in Tel Aviv," he said

Canadian Birthrighters hear Sharon discuss his Gaza plan

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The most enthusiastic group among 3,000-odd Birthright Israel participants June 6 at the fifth annual Birthright Israel Mega Event were the Canadians, who waved flags, danced and sang at the tops of their lungs before hearing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon discuss his Gaza disengagement plan.

"This trip has been amazing! Everything is so beautiful here. I love it!" said 20-year-old Neil Fine from Ottawa, taking a break from jumping up and down with fellow Birthrighters in the International Convention Center to comment on his first trip to Israel.

"When I was planning on coming here, everyone was saying, 'Be careful; don't get killed.' All of my relatives were scared that I was going to get blown up. They made me promise that I would come back in one piece," continued Fine, who just completed his first year at the University of Ottawa in human kinetics.

"But it's not like that at all here. It's not like there are bombs going off everywhere. I don't feel scared to walk around the streets. In fact, I would definitely feel comfortable coming back again."

In his first public appearance after cabinet approved his Gaza plan, Sharon addressed the issue in his speech to the Diaspora youth.

"You have come to Israel during an important period for our future," he told the crowd, which, in addition to Birthrighters from Canada, the United States, France, Russia and Ukraine, included Minister for Diaspora Affairs Natan Sharansky as well as Charles Bronfman and other Birthright philanthropists.

"Today, the State of Israel took a stand of great importance for its future. The government of Israel has approved the disengagement plan that I submitted, sending a clear message to the people of Israel, our Palestinian neighbours and to the entire world that Israel is taking its future into its own hands.

"Today, the government decided that it is Israel's intention to relocate all of the Israeli settlements in the Gaza Strip and four settlements in Samaria by the end of 2005," he added. "Most Israelis understand the great importance of today's government resolution. It is a resolution that ensures the future of Israel. It is a resolution that is good for Israel's security, its international standing, its economy and the demography of the Jewish people in the Land of Israel."

Sharon appeared to have earned the Birthrighters' support.

Jeremy Peskin, a 20-year-old Birthright Israel participant from Toronto, said the plan is "an inevitable eventuality. It's necessary for it to happen to end the violence conclusively.

"But what's most important are the conditions upon which it takes place," he added. "I am hopeful and confident that Prime Minister Sharon will make the right decision and that he will gain the support of the country."

Sharon also talked about their return to Israel after Birthright. "Every visit like yours strengthens Israel," he told the participants.

"Every young person who returns from Israel and tells what he saw here to students on campuses overseas; every young person who takes part in Jewish activities in his community; every young person like this strengthens Israel.

Ariel Sharon speaking to the Birthrighters [Israel photo]

"Above all, every young person who makes aliyah to Israel is the greatest resource of strength for the future of the State of Israel," he continued. "I call upon you to join us in building the Jewish nation, the only country where Jews can truly live as Jews. The Jewish people need you; the State of Israel needs you, today more than ever."

The mood of the Canadian Birthright participants was perhaps summed up by Aaron Grossman, a 26-year-old Waterloo native who lives in Toronto.

"I love this country! This country is here for us and I understand that now. Jews live all over the world, but this is our home."

Overwhelmed with emotion, he said it was hard to describe how he felt.

"I have always been Jewish, but until now, I haven't felt Jewish," Grossman said. "This is the first time in my life that I have really felt Jewish. Being Jewish does not just denote your religion, it denotes who you are. I am Jewish and the people of Israel are my people. I am a part of them and they are a part of me."

Tribute to Israel

The Exodus 1947 and UNSCOP

By JOHN ROSS

Every nation that has successfully achieved its independence looks back in time for the historical event that can be considered the symbolic turning point that led to its statehood.

In the case of the United States, this event is generally accepted to be the Boston Tea Party, the famous act of defiance in a colonial seaport that demonstrated to the world the many unresolved trade and economic grievances that led directly to the American Revolution.

In the case of Israel, many people believe the critical turning point was also a maritime event: the arrival of the Haganah refugee ship Exodus 1947 in the port of Haifa at a time when the British Mandatory government was enforcing its restrictive immigration policy of allowing only 1,500 Jews a month into Palestine.

The 4,500 Holocaust survivors on board this ship were all forcibly disembarked by the British and placed on prison ships that took them back to Germany, and they came to symbolize the sorrowful plight of European Jewry and their unwavering determination to settle in their national homeland. Accordingly, many historians point to the Exodus 1947 as the catalyst for the reversal in policy of the United Nations towards Jews, and the impetus for the General Assembly's resolution that partitioned Palestine to form a Jewish state in November 1947.

Ivan Rand

This perspective was legitimized by some of Israel's greatest leaders and was premised on the fact that when the Exodus 1947 arrived in Haifa harbour on July 18, 1947, several members of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), the 11-member committee entrusted by the United Nations to write a report on the future of Palestine, watched the events unfold that entire afternoon. They had been escorted to Haifa in advance by Aubrey (Abba) Eban, then a Jewish Agency liaison officer for UNSCOP, who had recognized the potential significance of the Haganah operation, and had suggested that they might want to see for themselves the arrival of the ship.

Eban wrote about this in his autobiography and stated that the UNSCOP members who had witnessed the scene "were pale with shock. I could see that they were preoccupied with one point alone: if this was the only way that the British Mandate could continue, it would be better not to continue at all."

This sentiment was further echoed by Golda Meir in her memoirs, when she wrote that "before the shocked eyes of the members of UNSCOP, [the British] forcibly caged and returned to Germany the 4,500 refugees…, and by so doing I think that they actually contributed considerably to UNSCOP's final recommendations."

Finally, Michael Bar-Zohar, a biographer of David Ben-Gurion referred to this event in the same terms when he wrote that Ben-Gurion "was aware that more than any 'historical right,' more even than moral obligation on the part of the world toward Jewish people as expressed in the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate, the tragedy of the Jewish DPs in Europe was the most convincing argument for the members of UNSCOP to recommend founding the state."

He added that "the tragedy of the 4,500 Exodus 1947 immigrants was not in vain; on the quay in the port of Haifa, watching in agitation, stood members of the United Nations inquiry committee. Ben-Gurion was absolutely certain that the Jewish state was knocking at the gates."

Present-day history books, such as Martin Gilbert's Israel: A History, reaffirm the centrality of Exodus 1947 as the basis for the UNSCOP majority recommendation in favour of the partition of Palestine, with the historical lesson being that worldwide sympathy for the victims of the Holocaust and the strategic and forceful intervention of Jewish Agency leaders in bringing this issue to the forefront led to the creation of the State of Israel. But is this assessment about the role of Exodus 1947 correct and is the lesson to be derived from it still valid and helpful?

A review of the historical record and of the UNSCOP papers indicates that the popular account connecting UNSCOP and Exodus 1947 is not only erroneous, but entirely contrary to what actually occurred. The transcripts of meetings of the UNSCOP representatives show that the majority of the members were unresponsive to the issue of Jewish immigration and that the events in Haifa on July 18, 1947, played absolutely no role in their decision on partition. Vladimir Simic, the UNSCOP member from Yugoslavia, who was widely quoted as being the most upset at the treatment of the Holocaust survivors by the British, actually voted against partition. Instead, he recommended to the United Nations General Assembly, in his minority report, that Palestine be turned into a unitary state with an Arab majority.

Members of the special committee were not impressed

Another highly respected UNSCOP member present that day was Emil Sandstrom, the Swedish jurist who had been appointed chair of the committee by his fellow members. Sandstrom, however, was also unimpressed. He stated that although he sympathized with the plight of the refugees, he was sickened by the capital made out of it by the Zionist propaganda. Sandstrom had seen the efforts of British soldiers to comfort and assist the refugees, and in particular, the "actions of one soldier who was carrying a suitcase down the ship's gangway for a crying boy, comforting him with the words, 'Cheer up laddie, it won't be long before you're back here.' Sandstrom, having read the newspaper articles on Exodus 1947 in the Jewish press, questioned why this wasn't reported in any of the coverage.

David Ben-Gurion

The only mention of Exodus 1947 in the entire UNSCOP report was in clause 119 of the "Background Facts," and it read as follows:

"During its stay in Palestine, the committee heard from certain of its members an eyewitness account of the incidents relative to the bringing into port of Haifa, under British naval escort, of the illegal immigrant ship Exodus 1947. In this, as in similar incidents, the committee has noted the persistence of the attempts to bring Jewish immigrants to Palestine, irrespective of determined preventive measures on the part of the administration, and also the far-reaching support which such attempts receive from the Jewish community in Palestine and abroad."

This neutral comment was also followed by an additional UNSCOP finding that the issue of Jewish refugees could not be addressed by allowing unrestricted immigration into Palestine, and that their recommendation on Palestine should not be considered a solution to the Jewish problem. These findings by UNSCOP, therefore, do not support the conclusions of Eban, Meir and Ben-Gurion, and in light of the fact that UNSCOP members were not impressed by the actions of the Jewish Agency in the whole affair, it can be reasonably argued that Exodus 1947 was actually counter-productive in the UNSCOP recommendation for partition. But if the UNSCOP report was the primary reason for the United Nations' resolution in favour of partition, the question still remains: what were the events and factors that prompted UNSCOP to recommend a Jewish state?

Ironically, the answer may rest with both a "tea party" and a speech that was given on July 18, 1947, once the focus is shifted towards the member of UNSCOP who had the greatest impact and influence upon the final report. This person was Justice Ivan Rand of the Supreme Court of Canada, the member who was credited with putting forward the scheme for partition and for ensuring that the Jewish state had the Negev and the Galilee within its borders. He was also the member who had the most appreciation for the historical significance of the Balfour Declaration and who vigorously advanced the Jewish cause at all the UNSCOP meetings. Most importantly, Rand garnered support for the partition plan from his fellow members and helped draft the final report so that its majority recommendation was clear, precise and unanimous, all of which made it the formidable document that ultimately persuaded the United Nations General Assembly to vote in favour of the report.

Moshe Sharett

The key to understanding the UNSCOP decision, therefore, is to identify the people who influenced Rand while he was in Palestine. The numerous exchanges between Rand and expatriate Canadians, both Jewish and Christian, who had moved to Israel, and his meetings with Zionists who were involved in the economic development of Palestine under the auspices of the "Brandeis Group," an economic corporation that had been guided by former justice Louis Brandeis of the U.S. Supreme Court to invest in Palestine, undoubtedly left a powerful impression on him.

'Rand was thoroughly won over to the Zionist cause'

But two Jewish political leaders appear to have imparted to Rand the understanding and tools necessary to advance the Zionist cause and to have it prevail in the UNSCOP deliberations. These men were Chaim Weizmann, former head of the World Zionist Organization and first president of the State of Israel, and Moshe Sharett (Shertok), former head of the Jewish Agency's political department and the second prime minister of the State of Israel.

Weizmann was fortunate to have been able to even address the UNSCOP members in Jerusalem, as Ben-Gurion, his successor in a bitter rivalry at the World Zionist Organization, had sought to ostracize Weizmann and to keep Weizmann's recommendation for partition excluded as a valid option for consideration. This was because Ben-Gurion had wanted a Jewish unitary state in all of Palestine and had believed that Weizmann's pragmatic philosophy of quiet diplomacy and civility would be totally unproductive.

But while Ben-Gurion expressed displeasure at Weizmann's address, Rand listened attentively and accepted Weizmann's position as the basis for his own partition scheme. Rand was so impressed with Weizmann that he and the other committee members sought an additional private meeting with Weizmann. They arranged this by having dinner and tea at Weizmann's residence in Rehovot. At this relaxed and informal opportunity for conversation, Weizmann's ideas, his scientific achievements and his influential friendship with world leaders were discussed and completely captivated Rand.

According to David Horowitz, the Jewish Agency liaison officer who accompanied Rand throughout his time in Palestine, Rand continually expressed his view as to "what a great man Weizmann was," and it was therefore no accident that the words of Weizmann found their continued expression in Rand's memorandum on partition and the deliberations leading up to the UNSCOP final report.

Chaim Weizmann

On July 18, 1947, while some of the UNSCOP members were in Haifa watching Exodus 1947 sail into port, Rand remained in Jerusalem, listening to Moshe Sharett give his address on the economic disparity between Jews and Arabs living in Palestine. This topic was critical for UNSCOP members and especially for Rand, since the Canadian Department of Foreign Affairs had suggested to Rand that a continued trusteeship for Palestine was the best option to follow because the economic and political disparity between Jews and Arabs was too great. Canada wanted, as did most western countries, the status quo to continue until the Arabs could develop their own economy and infrastructure to be on par with that of the Jews, whether it took five years or another 50 years.

Sharett, in a brilliant analysis that incorporated a review of the labour laws enacted during the British Mandate, demonstrated how the discrepancy was entirely due to British and Arab exploitation of their fellow workers, despite the efforts of the Jews to obtain better wages and working conditions for all the inhabitants of Palestine. He also explained to Rand how a Jewish state in Palestine would be an economic benefit to the entire region and how the standard of living would immediately rise for Arabs and Jews with the enactment of progressive laws and equitable wage settlements.

Sharett's comments undoubtedly struck a responsive chord, as Rand was a social activist and Canada's leading jurist. Not only had Rand supported and enshrined progressive laws in Canada by his own judicial decisions, he was also a highly distinguished labour arbitrator having recently settled a major labour dispute by creating the "Rand Formula," a ruling still in use today.

On July 18, 1947, the clinching arguments for partition were given to UNSCOP, not in Haifa, but in Jerusalem. As a result, Rand, the key member of the committee, was thoroughly won over to the Zionist cause, and a report was soon issued that changed the world. Yet mainstream history books and political autobiographies have completely overlooked the pivotal role of Rand, Weizmann and Sharett in the founding of the State of Israel and have continued to concentrate on the myth of Exodus 1947 being the rationale for the UNSCOP majority report. This error deserves to be rectified; however, even if it were possible to erase the offending passages in all these books, justice would still not be complete until one canvassed anew the valuable lessons that can be taught about this important time in Israel's history.

The Carmel Forest Spa Resort: an enchanted world

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Mount Carmel, in the north of Israel near Haifa, was always celebrated for its lush, verdant fertility.

The very word Carmel in ancient times was synonymous with beauty. It is not surprising therefore that it appears in the canonized love poem Shir Hashirim, Song of Songs, as a metaphor for beauty.

Carmel is a contraction of the words Kerem El, meaning God's vineyard, suggestive of the fact, as the late Israeli geographer Zev Vilnay noted, that the area was once covered with vineyards.

While there may be fewer vineyards there today than in days of old, the beauty of the forested promontory some 500 metres above sea level, is no less noticed and no less admired by the people who live nearby. Its pine trees are said to be the largest, most beautiful in Israel. And Israelis love to stroll, hike and picnic among those tall trees of the Carmel range, where the air is clean and scented with the refreshing aroma of pine.

The Carmel Forest Spa Resort's surrounding grounds.

High atop the mountain range, almost hidden among the trees at the end of a winding road near the kibbutz Beit Oren is the Carmel Forest Spa Resort.

I recently spent three days there as a guest of management. It was like falling into an enchanted world.

As soon as I entered the premises, I immediately felt the atmosphere of a "different" world. All was quiet; there was total calm.

Subsequently I was told that the use of cellphones in the public areas of the complex was prohibited. That alone set the resort apart from every other place in Israel.

Ya'arot Hacarmel has the appearance of a chalet and the feel of a fine hotel. Earth tones of beige and brown are the predominant colours of the open, central spaces, highlighted by wood and stone finishes on the floors and walls.

Many of the guests I saw in the lobby and in the other public spaces of the resort were wearing white terrycloth robes. They appeared relaxed and at ease, even though they were wearing, essentially, only slippers, a housecoat and undergarments. "Laid back" hardly described the smoothness or the languor of their steps.

It was a foreshadowing of the relaxation I too would experience in the ensuing days.

The actual complex is built like a cross-section of a honeycomb, terraced into the side of the mountain, each floor stacked at an angle above the next to afford all the guests a view of the Mediterranean, which is visible and glistening in the sun a short distance to the west.

From my room, I could see Atlit on the coast. In Crusader times, Atlit was a castled waystation for pilgrims. In modern times, it was a detention camp built by the British government to imprison Jewish refugees trying to reach Eretz Yisrael during and after World War II.

Yitzhak Rabin, then a young Palmach commander, led an attack against the camp to rescue the refugees, and then took them through the very area where the spa hides in the forest, to sanctuary at Beit Oren, a kibbutz nearby.

A short jaunt to the east of the resort is Mukrakha, where Carmelite Christians built a monastery on the same spot from which they claim Elijah the prophet built his altar to God and from which tradition holds he ascended to heaven.

The significance of the environs is not lost on me. Not only is the area geographically breathtaking, but it is also rich with history in a way that lends deep satisfaction to the moments of quiet contemplation that the surroundings encourage.

The Carmel Forest complex has two components: a resort and a spa, both of which are relatively new. The building was actually built by the German government as a convalescent home for survivors of the Shoah. But seven years ago, its owners, Isrotel, expanded and renovated the structure into its present bi-functional, luxurious, eye-catching form.

The complex is situated on 15 forested acres adjacent to a national state park. It employs approximately 250 people, and general manager, Sylvie Cohen, was quick to point out that this translates into a staff-to-guest ratio that far exceeds the norm in the hotel industry.

The purpose and the result of that high staff-guest ratio, Cohen suggested, was to ensure a very high standard of service and of pampering for the benefit of the guests at Carmel Forest Spa Resort.

My days there confirmed Cohen's assertion. Devotion to detail and deference to the guests, it seemed to me, were the operational imperatives of the staff. The spa resort advertises itself as the "preferred place to relax and enhance your life style." It was impossible to quarrel with that self-description. At every turn, there were programs, facilities and opportunities to integrate physical, intellectual and spiritual health.

The resort has 126 rooms, each luxuriously appointed with modest, understated elegance.

The symbol of the resort is the pine cone, and with good reason. The gentle scent of pine is ubiquitous. It filters through the halls. It crackles in the fireplace in the lobby at night and permeates all the materials distributed to guests, including the zesty body splash and soap in the washrooms.

Very few details have been spared to create a comforting and comfortable ambience.

'Unforgettable and a great time'

Relaxing in front of the fireplace in the main lobby at Carmel Forest Spa Resort.

Along with the absence of cellphones in public spaces, so too are cigarettes forbidden. Nor are children below middle teenage years of age allowed in the resort.

The many indoor and outdoor nooks and crannies are designed for private sitting and relaxation.

For guests who cannot relax by quiet contemplation there is also a games room with a pool table, dart boards, playing cards, backgammon, checkers and chess boards and dominoes.

In the evening, low lighting sets the mood. Candlelight in the tea room and various sitting rooms provides the accent. For added delight, there was also live harp and piano entertainment.

For guests seeking the inspiration that derives from the sounds of silent streams, there is an inner court near the lobby with a small pond and benches nearby on which to rest or simply read a book.

My chief joy in the resort however, was with the uncompromisingly high standard of the fine gourmet dining. Expert hands were at work in the resort's kosher kitchen. Even the foam on the cappuccino was formed into the shape of a heart.

"Healthy and tasty" is the motto of the resort's chefs. Three lavish meals are provided daily. Each meal is anchored by a delightfully generous salad bar. And the main courses for both lunch and dinner are varied, delicious and healthy.

Five sous-chefs help the master chef prepare lunch; seven sous-chefs are at work for dinner. And to add an additional esthetic of ambience and charm, rose petals adorned the dinner tables. The pitchers of drinking water contained fresh lemon and mint.

The resort even posted nutritional information about the meals each day in the dining room.

Desserts are exquisitely tasty, adequate sizes, indulgent but not excessive. Sorbets, chocolate…

There are 25 individual treatment rooms in the Spa. The number of different personal health treatments available is so large and varied that a 68-page information booklet is required to record and explain them.

The facilities include an indoor and outdoor pool, a solarium, Turkish hamam, jacuzzi and exercise rooms.

The indoor swimming pool is fully accessible to people with disabilities.

When it was time to leave, I read some of the testimonial statements written in the guest book. I was struck by the fact so many guests were from outside Israel.

"This is a unique place where mind and body meet in harmony, where all your needs are satisfied. The decor is splendid, the food exquisite and exciting, the rooms so inviting, and all the activities are fun and well-presented. The spa is fab. Yes, we shall come back. We leave stress-free and happy. Thanks." (from London)

"Unbelievable pampering, beauty, elegance and taste." (from New York)

"A wonderful, magical place, marvellous facility, outstanding service and sumptuous meals." (Highland Park, Illinois)

"Unforgettable and a great time. Ciao." (from Rome)

And there were other endorsements from places such as Florida, California, Boulogne, Lyon, Milan and many others.

And I agreed with them all.

It is no wonder that Eliahu may have ascended to heaven in his mystical chariot from somewhere in the Carmel Forest. Having spent three days at the Carmel Forest Spa Resort, his point of departure may have been a close facsimile of where he was headed.

Intifadah inspired aliyah

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Two years after the intifadah erupted, in October 2002, native Torontonian David Spindel decided it was time to come and visit Israel.

"When the intifadah started, it was like an awakening," says Spindel, 24, who was then working as a tech researcher for Data Monitor, a British consulting market research house in New York City. "Israel was on the front page of the paper every single day and seeing terrible things happening there day after day caused me to start thinking, talking and reading more about Israel."

Spindel's interest in Israel also grew as a result of the anti-Israel comments of some of his colleagues.

"I heard one woman at my company say that what Israel was doing was worse than South African apartheid and worse than what the Nazis did," Spindel recalls. "When people say these things, you feel in your heart that it's not true. But maybe they are right. Maybe I had been told the wrong things all my life, and so I started reading about it and the more I read about it, the more I had this longing to be part of it."

Then one day, while perusing the Internet with a non-Jewish colleague/friend who had found a particularly brutal photograph depicting a scene in Gaza City, Spindel told his friend, "You see Gaza and you think that is Israel. I wish you could see Israel like I have seen Israel."

The Yeshiva University (YU) graduate then told his friend about the year he spent in Israel studying at Yeshivat Hakotel in 1997.

"My friend said, 'OK, let's go to Israel,'" Spindel recalls. "So, we did."

Less than a month later, the two were on a plane bound for Ben-Gurion Airport.

"I saw things in Israel that I had seen before, but that I had never really seen before. I saw things that I had never seen before," says Spindel, who spent 10 days touring around the country. "All of a sudden, I started to get that feeling, that vibe, that I just wanted to stay longer and longer. I just fell in love with the country."

The trip was a turning point in Spindel's life. When he returned to New York, he couldn't get Israel off his mind.

"I wanted to reconnect and I wanted to come back to see if that feeling was just a feeling I had because I was on a vacation, or if it was always there with me," says Spindel, who is currently studying Hebrew at Ulpan Etzion in Jerusalem, after making aliyah at the beginning of January.

"Aliyah seemed like a good idea, or at least an idea worth pursuing," he says. "So, here I am pursuing it."

'Just this feeling that you want to be a part of it'

But the path has not been easy. The first challenge he faced was dealing with the immigration process. "The bureaucracy surrounding immigration is a hassle in every country," says Spindel, who spent his first week in Israel travelling from office to office and from line-up to line-up. "But, here it's a nightmare.

"For instance, I have learned that the post office is king in this country," he says with a laugh. "Everything goes through the post office, which runs hours that I still have not figured out."

Living in Jerusalem has also been a big adjustment. "Jerusalem has lost some of its magic for me," he admits. "The dog poop and the trash tend to have that effect. The lack of environmental consciousness in Israel, and in Jerusalem in particular, is terrible."

He goes on to describe the city's never-ending construction, lack of professional opportunities and tensions between the cultural and religious sectors. "This is the capital of Israel and it's very, very dirty."

When his ulpan ends next week, Spindel intends to move to Tel Aviv immediately. "In Tel Aviv, you've got the beach, it's a more fun city, it's cleaner and there are jobs there," he says. He has already landed a position as a currency trader near Ramat Gan.

The bureaucracy and filth of the capital city aside, Spindel's biggest challenge has been dealing with life without his friends and family. "The hardest thing in the world is leaving everything you know. I miss my friends and family every day," he says, explaining, for example, that his second niece was born in Toronto while he was in ulpan. "Even with e-mail and instant messaging and the phone, it's not the same.

David Spindel

"I don't know if anyone can truly explain what motivates someone to come to Israel. It's a combination of so many things, of so many feelings," Spindel continues. "I don't know if it's possible to put into words why a person chooses to leave all his friends, his family, his job, his apartment, the place he knows and the people he loves, to go to a place thousands of miles a way where you don't speak the language, where taxes are insane and where everything costs a fortune.

"Yet people do it by the droves. There is no other nation of people in the world that does this," he says. "There is just this feeling that you want to be a part of it, and in a way, you feel empty without it."

Life in Israel has its ups and downs. "It really depends on the day," says Spindel, who looks forward with anticipation to his mother's home-baked-cookie care packages. "On a good day, I'm thrilled and on a bad day, I am homesick."

But the people of Israel have been good to him, he says. "The best thing about Israel is that some of the people here are the kindest and most open-hearted."

Before he found a job as a currency trader, he met with a friend of a friend who offered him help finding a job, an apartment and even new friends. "He was a total stranger to me, but he treated me like I was his next of kin. People take care of each other in Israel in a way that you don't find anywhere else."

He has also made lots of new friends at ulpan. "I am friends with people I never thought I would be friends with," he says. His ulpan class, which has about 120 people from some 26 different countries, represents a microcosm of the ingathering of the exiles. "It has been an experience to meet Jewish people from such a wide variety of backgrounds.

"At the end of the day, we can disagree with each other politically to a huge degree. But at the end of the day, we are all interested in the welfare of the Jewish state and the future of the Jewish people," he says. "That underlying concern is what unites us. I came here because I wanted to be a part of that unity and I hope I will be here to stay."

Centre aids victims of rape and abuse

By ATIRA WINCHESTER
Israel Press Service

JERUSALEM — Domestic and sexual abuse in the religious community has always existed, but professionals in the community have been ill-equipped to deal with the problem and have often even denied its existence outright.

In 1993, Debby Gross, a religious mother of six, established the National Crisis Center for Religious Women (NCCRW), which provided a lifeline for many long-suffering religious women.

The Jerusalem Rape Crisis Center (JRCC), run by former hotline volunteer Noga Shiloah, has provided crisis intervention and services regardless of religious orientation or nationality since 1981.

Last month, these two remarkable women were awarded the Teddy Kollek prize for leadership and excellence by the Jerusalem Foundation for their dedication and personal devotion in raising awareness among all sectors of the country's population about violence against women.

Gross, a developmental psychologist, was first moved to action in 1992 after a spate of child sexual abuse cases in Jerusalem's religious community forced the issue into the spotlight. She realized that a service geared to religious women had to be established and understood the discretion and sensitivity with which it needed to be approached. She chose 12 religious women volunteers and sought the approval of a number of rabbis from the entire religious spectrum for establishing a centre.

In November 1992, Gross opened a 24-hour hotline in Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek hospital, which received more than 300 phone calls in its first year.

"But we realized that helping people 'afterwards' just wasn't enough," Gross explains. "We needed to go out into the community and into the schools and educate people in order to raise awareness."

Gross faced the challenge of developing workshops on domestic and sexual abuse for a community that is uncomfortable talking explicitly about sex.

"We gave them names like, 'How to Keep Children Safe' and explained that not everybody is nice and can overcome their evil urges, and that we have a mitzvah to protect ourselves."

Ten years later, Gross's centre is still the only place that provides workshops for very young children, ages four and up. In the past year alone, the centre provided 600 workshops throughout Israel, mostly run by the seven paid NCCRW staff.

"Our aim isn't to scare these children. We talk about good secrets and bad secrets. We say: 'A good secret is when mummy prepares a surprise birthday party for daddy. A bad secret is something that gives you an icky feeling in your stomach.' We teach them to keep telling people a bad secret until they believe it."

In April 2003, the NCCRW moved from Shaare Zedek to new, more spacious premises in Talpiot. Just last year alone, volunteers answered 4,000 calls, a rise that can be attributed in part the establishment of a Russian-speaking hotline and, more recently, an Amharic hotline for Ethiopian women.

"When we started, people said the problem didn't exist," says Gross. "Now we have day-long workshops for ultra-Orthodox rabbis. We've come a long way."

Shiloah officially joined the JRCC in 1994, after two years volunteering on its hotline. It wasn't an obvious professional choice for a woman with a master's degree in marine biology, but her volunteer work with the centre while studying at the Hebrew University convinced her a change of direction was necessary.

"The fish were too silent," Shiloah jokes. "I felt very disconnected from the world and I wasn't satisfied. Working here has always been very demanding, but it's also very rewarding."

Under Shiloah's guidance, the centre has grown considerably. Services that were already in place have flourished, and new ones have been added, such as support groups for parents of abused children, the developmentally challenged, and victims of rape and incest.

Three years ago, the centre also started a hotline for Arab women called SAWA. The hotline was run from the centre until April 2003, when it moved to its own premises.

Even without SAWA, the JRCC boasts 102 hotline volunteers. Before starting, volunteers – of all ages and from a range of socio-economic backgrounds – receive more than 60 hours of training from experienced volunteers.

A painting by a rape victim at the Jerusalem Rape Crisis Center

"We teach volunteers what the law is concerning rape, abuse and harassment, and we explain what happens when a woman goes to the police or to a hospital," explains Shiloah. "Mostly, though, it's a personal, emotional process… Our approach is one of understanding and sympathy, realizing that we could have been the victim."

In addition to the hotline, JRCC volunteers have run 660 educational workshops– 500 of them in junior high or high schools – in the past year alone.

"Things have changed drastically," says Shiloah. "People used to think that we were this bizarre fringe group of radical feminists. Now we get so many calls asking for workshops that we can't even answer the need out there.

"In workshops, we raise the issue of honour and respect between men and women, we talk about issues surrounding relationships and a woman's right to say 'No,' and we screen a film that we produced which deals with date rape, a situation that teenagers can easily relate to.

Since the start of the intifadah 3½ years ago, the JRCC's task has become even more difficult. "The terror has silenced many women," says Shiloah. "They are reluctant to come to us with their problems when such horrific things are happening around them. This is very difficult, particularly as the ongoing conflict has led to heightened levels of tension throughout the country… which has been reflected in the nature and number of calls received by the hotline this year."

Nonetheless, some have spoken out: "I've learned that it's possible to live with the damage," wrote one woman. "That the damage caused doesn't fill all of me, that I'm a human being. The support group has become my family. The centre has become my home."

Although both Gross and Shiloah are donating their prize money to ongoing operating costs of their respective centres, both have plans for new projects should more funding become available.

Gross hopes eventually to establish a hostel to house women on a short-term basis until they make plans for alternative accommodation.

Shiloah dreams of printing the 40 testimonies that she has documented in a book similar to the American collection, Kiss Daddy Goodnight. She also hasn't given up on the idea, initiated more than six years ago, of building a joint centre for the JRCC, SAWA and the NCCRW.

"I'm not saying that everything would be unified," says Shiloah. "There might even be separate entrances, but we would co-operate as women. If in such a divided, conflicted city we could make it work, that would be highly symbolic."

Tribute to Israel

It's tough feeling like an outsider when Israelis make insider jokes

By JONATHAN UDREN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — I've decided that I no longer want to be American.

I'm not making a political statement or giving up my citizenship. I'm not even refusing to come back for a visit. I'm just sick of being American.

It's not even the fact that I'm American that really bothers me. It's more the fact that I'm not Israeli.

Sure, I have my Israeli identification card with my smiling face on it. I even have my new Israeli driver's licence. I'll vote in the next election, and the government will take my tax money once I start working.

But no matter how hard I try, I'm just no good at being Israeli. And even after nine months of citizenship and four months of Hebrew immersion, I still don't feel like I'm getting much closer.

A few nights ago, I went next door to the pizza shop and ordered a slice. The waitress didn't even entertain the idea of answering me back in Hebrew. She just started asking me what I wanted to drink in English.

How did she know just from my Hebrew line, "One slice with peppers please," that I wasn't Israeli? Was it because I said "please"? How un-Israeli of me. Maybe she noticed my Gap khakis? Or maybe it was just my accent. As much as I improve my Hebrew, I'll always be viewed as an immigrant.

Lately I've felt a strange contrast here in Jerusalem. On one hand, I feel completely at home, more at home than I felt even in North America. But on the other hand, I feel that in so many day-to-day situations, I'm standing outside peeking into the window of Israeli life. In an attempt to escape from the English-speaking womb I've been nestled in since my aliyah, I've made some changes over the last few months.

The first was to make an effort to improve my language skills. I've been practising every morning in a five-hour-a-day, state-sponsored Hebrew-language class for the last four months.

But I wanted not only to learn Hebrew grammar and vocabulary in the morning. I wanted a chance to use my Hebrew in real-world situations. This was also the advice that I got from every immigrant I know who has become fluent in Hebrew. At some point, they all had to immerse themselves.

So I began attending an Israeli yeshiva every afternoon. I knew a few Americans who had successfully integrated into the yeshiva's Hebrew program with great results. I would see them sometimes around town with their Israeli friends, speaking freely, laughing loudly and looking very Israeli. I couldn't figure out exactly what made them seem more Israeli, but whatever it was, I wanted it.

Over the last four months, spending four to five hours every day interacting with Israelis, I see the differences much more clearly. Despite their loud and tough exterior, there is a real honesty and sweetness to them. The comparison of an Israeli to a sabra, a desert cactus that is sharp on the outside but sweet on the inside, is actually well deserved. Overall, I have been shocked to find them more kind and genuine than me.

For example, the other day two men who apparently hadn't seen each in a while greeted each other with a huge hug, then kissed each other on the cheek. One put his hands on his friend's face. These were such loving and genuine gestures, unlike anything I had ever seen before between two male friends.

In general, Israelis seem more hands-on. It's uncommon to go through any conversation of significant length without being touched on your hand or shoulder. Often, two friends passing each other in the hall will make some contact, whether a pat on the back or a playful tickle. It took me aback at first, but I'm warming up to their caring gestures.

I pondered the reason for their affection and closeness. Israelis don't grow up in big suburban houses with white picket fences separating one family from another. They don't come from a culture of respecting "personal space." Instead, they embody the attitude of "what's mine is yours." While a beautiful idea, it's also very foreign to me.

But these Israelis are also veterans of the army, and that, too, has influenced them. Along with their sweetness and genuineness, there is also a toughness and distance that I've sensed in them.

Every night, I usually stay at the yeshiva for its simple Israeli-style dinner. I try to avoid sitting with my North American friends, even though they too will speak Hebrew with me. With them I can always fall back on English, and I don't want that option.

But when I sit with the Israelis, I find myself acting uncharacteristically shy. Sure, I recognize them and they recognize me, but we don't really know each other.

I generally don't start a conversation, though I usually introduce myself. Mostly, I find myself sitting there and listening, trying to understand their jokes or follow their conversations.

Sometimes they look at me with a hard stare as if say, "What, are you just sitting there eavesdropping?"

I look down at my sliced tomatoes and cucumbers. I'm so intimidated, not only because they speak so fast, but also because there is something intangibly different there that I will never quite get a grip on.

One recent night I was the only non-native Israeli sitting at a table of eight. One guy started by speaking to me in Hebrew: "Pass me the...," he started, then said the word "jam" in English with a poor imitation of a Southern accent.

"Jam" must be a funny word for Hebrew speakers, because the rest of the table got a real kick out of his question. I tried to laugh along, thinking this was their way of trying to relate to me.

I answered back in Hebrew. "Sure, here's the jam," I said, using a real Southern accent, the one I picked up going to college in Tallahassee, Fla.

But no one laughed.

The rest of the meal people kept asking me for the "jam," and each time it would bring a few chuckles. I guess it was an inside joke, but I didn't feel like an insider. I still felt like an onlooker peeking in the window, despite how much I wanted that barrier to vanish.

I think there must be things that I bring as a North American that can add to the richness of the culture here: saying "excuse me" when I bump into someone, a greater use of "please" and "thank you," the patience to not to cut in front of others in the grocery line.

I'm glad I can bring these qualities to Israel, but I can't help but want what I'll never acquire. I'll never be able to speak without an accent, I'll never remember all the abbreviations on my bank statement. I am an immigrant, and will always be looked at as one. I never will be truly Israeli.

But maybe one day I'll be the one surprising an American bystander with a heartfelt gesture.

Our Best Wishes

Together We're Stronger!

A Salute to Our Community and Its Volunteers

ANNUAL ISSUE 10th ANNUAL ISSUE

UJA FEDERATION
Together we're stronger

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Jewish Toronto represents a remarkable community. We are recognized worldwide as caring and compassionate, exceedingly generous, strongly attached to Israel, deeply devoted to traditional Jewish values yet firmly focused on the future.

The globally acclaimed character of our community is reflected through thousands of volunteers whose sole motivation is serving others every day of every year. That's why this Volunteer Recognition Supplement and the wonderful men and women honoured here are so significant. They symbolize the essence of our community.

Our community volunteers stand for care, compassion and partnership. All of our community's critically required facilities, programs and services are made stronger by the selflessness, kindness and devotion of our volunteers.

UJA Federation salutes you. Thank you for your commitment, your strength and your outstanding support for people in need. You have literally changed thousands of lives for generations to come.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2005

BUILDING A SECURE JEWISH FUTURE

As the Chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2005, it with great pleasure and even greater pride that we pay tribute to the dedicated volunteers featured within these pages.

Your selfless and unwavering efforts power the annual UJA Federation campaign and provide life-saving assistance to thousands of our community members. Through your wonderful work, Jews in need here at home and the people of Israel can always count on us.

As UJA Federation Campaign 2005 raises funds for a secure Jewish future in a disturbing world, your exceptional volunteer achievements enhance the personal security that all of us require.

Thank you for demonstrating our sacred responsibility for each other by sharing your time, your talents and, most of all, your kindness.

Together ... as one person with one heart

We have recently celebrated the giving of the Torah on Shavuot, and are moving towards the sorrowful period marking the destruction of the Holy Temple. This marks an important transition on our calendars.

While encamped at the foot of Mount Sinai to receive the Torah, we were "as one person with one heart." Tradition teaches that all souls — past, present and future — were present to witness the giving of the holy Torah. We were able to reach the apex of our spiritual and national perfection because each individual was included in the collective.

It is interesting to note that the Torah's 600,000 letters correspond to the 600,000 who left in the Exodus from Egypt. We learn that if just one letter is missing, an entire Torah scroll is considered flawed. Similarly, then, the community must be cognizant of the tremendous worth of each and every member. If even one Jew is omitted, we are all deficient.

If receiving the Torah at Sinai was predicated upon unity, the obverse is then true for the destruction of the Temple, which was due to baseless hatred ... for caring only about one's self and not considering the importance and needs of the "other."

This week's Parsha begins with the narrative of Korach, whose desire to assume the leadership of the Jewish nation caused him and his followers to revolt against Moses and Aaron, his cousins.

The Parsha opens with the words "vayikach Korach," literally "and Korach took." The commentator Rashi suggests that Korach took himself to one side ... he separated himself from the collective. He did not see himself as part of the community, but separate and apart from it — with tragic results.

We must heed these timeless lessons from the Korach tragedy. We are enjoined to be communally inclusive, which is the only path to grow and build and prosper as a people. This obligation is incumbent upon us all — the "organized" community and amcha. We are all leaders in our own unique way. We cannot be lulled into thinking that someone else should worry about the other person ... it has been remarked that to the other person, you are the other person!

We are at a pivotal point — on the calendar and in the history of our community. We must draw upon the lesson of our Sinai experience as a foil against the tragedy of the anti-communal views of Korach and his rebels.

As you peruse this Volunteer Recognition Supplement, you will be struck by the numerous volunteers and organizations being recognized together. It is testimony that the Toronto community is heeding the call of our tradition of inclusiveness ... emanating directly from Sinai.

Daniel Fine, Director, UJA Federation Israel Now, is the 2003 recipient of the World Council of Jewish Communal Service Exemplar Award.

Community Awards

The women and men pictured on Pages C3 and C4 have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many and instills enormous community pride in us all. These community role models received their Volunteer Recognition Awards on behalf of the entire community at UJA Federation's Annual Meeting on June 3, 2004.

GRANOVSKY AWARD FOR CAMPAIGN EXCELLENCE

Named after the late Jewish community leader Phil Granovsky, this award is a tribute to individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning.

DONALD BENNETT

For nearly 25 years, Donald has been actively involved in Toronto's Jewish community, demonstrating outstanding leadership in a variety of roles. His accounting background led him to chair the UJA Federation Lawyers and Accountants Division in 2004, a division he had been involved in for many years. He also chaired UJA Federation's Pledge Redemption Committee in 2002 and 2003, leading the charge to bring in funds and boost annual campaigns.

A former Shem Tov Award winner for his involvement with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, Donald is a fervent telethon participant and has given hundreds of hours of his time to canvassing for UJA Federation Campaigns.

Among his other community commitments, he has been a member of the Board of Directors of UJA Federation, the Board of Jewish Education and JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto.

"This award is quite humbling. I really accept this award on behalf of all the volunteers who work tirelessly for the UJA Federation Campaign and achieve remarkable results. The Campaign is a partnership that only succeeds because of the help and cooperation between the volunteers, the donors and, last but not least, the wonderful professionals. Volunteering is fun!"

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT AWARDS

Leadership Development Awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

NATAN ARONSHTAM

An immigrant to Toronto himself, Natan has long been committed to improving life for newcomers to our city. His community involvement began as a volunteer at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, where he later joined the Board of Directors.

A member of the UJA Federation Board for the past year and a member of the JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto Board for the past two years, Natan also sits on UJA Federation's Community Engagement Committee, Community Planning and Allocations Steering Committee, and the Vaughan Campus Steering Committee, and is a long serving member of the Board of the Jewish Russian Community Centre.

"I volunteer because it is my way of giving back to this great community which welcomed our family when we arrived here. The need for more services is great and I feel privileged to be a part of organizations trying to make a difference in improving the quality of life for our community."

DAVID SPIRO

A volunteer in Young Leadership at the local, national and international levels for several years, David has been a member of the United Jewish Communities Young Leadership Cabinet since 2002, and its Canada Co-Chair since 2003.

In 2001, David founded and chaired the UJA Federation Young Lawyers Network. He is an Executive Member of the UJA Federation Ben Gurion Society, and co-chaired the Young Adult Division for Campaign 2004. He is also the YAD Cabinet Chair for UJA Federation Campaign 2005. An Executive Member of the UIA Federations Canada National Young Leadership, David received their Young Leadership Award in 2003.

"My paternal grandfather was a rabbi, shochet, mohel and chazzan, serving small communities across Canada while working tirelessly to save fellow Jews from the flames of the Holocaust. My maternal grandfather was a model of quiet tzedakah whose greatest pleasure was helping others. I volunteer because of their dedication and selflessness."

Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto PROFESSIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE AWARD OF EXCELLENCE

This Award of Excellence recognizes professionals in the Jewish community whose outstanding long-term contributions benefit the Foundation, lawyers, accountants, estate planners and charitable organizations.

WOLFE D. GOODMAN, Q.C.

Wolfe is the first recipient of the Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence.

Wolfe was instrumental in helping create the infrastructure that enables the Foundation to offer services to so many individuals, families and professionals.

Without his resolute leadership, his pursuit of achieving philanthropic goals for clients and charities alike, and his enormous depth of understanding of the tax and estate planning fields, the Foundation would never have become the important resource centre that it is today.

Presentation of the Award of Excellence was made at a Professional Advisory Committee Seminar on May 12, 2004.

Community Awards continue on Page C4

Community Awards (con'd)

SHEM TOV HONOUREES

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

ALAN DESSAU
Circle of Care

For 30 years, Alan has been a dedicated volunteer at Circle of Care, serving in various capacities, including President of the Circle of Care Foundation. He also sits on the Board of Directors at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and is the Past President of the York Region United Way, where he is also an honorary Board Member. In addition, Alan is a Past President of Temple Har Zion and currently sits on the Fundraising Committee.

"It is a privilege to volunteer when needed. It is extra special to be asked to contribute in a leadership role. I've been lucky to have been able to do both, working with many dedicated people at Circle of Care."

NATHAN DISENHOUSE
Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa

Since 1984, Nathan has been a fixture at the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa. He has held a variety of positions, including President, Chair of the Endowment Committee and Chair of the Board and Executive. He currently is a member of the Loan Cassa Past Presidents' Council. In addition, Nathan is a Board Member and the Treasurer of Jewish National Fund.

"Volunteering in our community was part of my upbringing. My parents taught me that you need to give back to the community what they have given to you. TJFLC gives assistance to our own whether they have their roots in Canada or are coming to establish new roots."

BERNARD FISHBEIN
Bathurst Jewish Community Centre

Currently the President of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, Bernie has spent many years on the BJCC's Executive and Board of Governors. An extraordinarily dedicated member of the community, he sits on the Board of Governors of Adath Israel Synagogue. A lawyer by profession, Bernie is a former Chair of the Labour Law Section of the Canadian Bar Association of Ontario and presently serves as Vice Chair of the University of Toronto Discipline Tribunal.

"Every time I see the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre buzzing with families, or the happy blend of seniors and day care children, I have no doubt that the time I give is well worthwhile."

SUSAN FRIEDRICH
Kehilla Residential Programme

It can be said that Susan is one of the true visionaries of Jewish Toronto. A well-respected architect, she has recently completed the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, an exciting component of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign initiative. Her many volunteer activities include serving on the Board of Directors of the Kehilla Residential Programme and on the UJA Federation Real Estate Cabinet.

"It is a great privilege to contribute to the Toronto Jewish community as a volunteer. As an advocate for affordable housing and special needs projects, it is especially significant to be able to address these issues within the Jewish community. Moreover, as a child of Holocaust survivors, and given the current environment, it is particularly important to me to be part of a process that involves building for the future of this wonderful community."

MARSHALL KESTEN
UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education

A devoted volunteer, Marshall is the Immediate Past Chair of the Board of Jewish Education, having chaired or served on numerous BJE committees. A UJA Federation and Bathurst Jewish Community Centre Board Member, he is also Past President of Jewish Family & Child Service, Netivot HaTorah Day School and Shomrai Shabboth Congregation. In addition, Marshall has been involved in various committees planning UJA Federation's City North, the proposed Jewish community development in Vaughan, a Tomorrow Campaign initiative.

"For me, volunteering is just trying to make things a 'bit better.' Paraphrasing Rabbi Tarfon, 'You needn't complete the task, neither may you ignore it.' Volunteering is intrinsically rewarding!"

CHARLES NOVOGRODSKY
Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre

Since 1998, Charles' impressive association with the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre has included sitting on the Board, and serving as President from 2002-2003 and Vice President from 2000-2001. His many past volunteer commitments include a seat on the New Israel Fund of Canada Board of Directors, Co-Chair, Huron Street School Parent Association, and Founding Member of the U of T Campus Community Day Care Centre.

"Volunteering is an expression of Jewish values. The revitalized Miles Nadal JCC, powered by volunteer effort, adds immeasurable value to our downtown/Jewish community."

Volunteer in your Toronto Jewish community

You, too, can share your expertise or talents – offer your time to someone who needs you – make new friends and contacts – experience the satisfaction that comes from helping others – develop a stronger connection to our Jewish community.

The many rewarding volunteer opportunities waiting for you include administrative support, serving as a Big Brother, visiting the sick and the elderly, fundraising for UJA Federation or working with children who have special needs.

For more information on these and other community volunteer opportunities, visit www.jewishtoronto.com (click Volunteering)

A Decade of Distinction

In Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers), we are advised not to separate ourselves from the community. This seemingly simple injunction represents the essence of Jewish living. We are all dependent on each other and responsible for each other. The community strengthens every individual and every individual strengthens the community.

This strength is visible through our vibrant schools, our community centres, our agencies and our skilled, motivated and devoted volunteers.

For the past ten years, UJA Federation has been honoured to help the community pay tribute to these volunteers without whom our community could not function. And in this, our 10th Annual Volunteer Recognition Supplement, we urge you to join the thousands of dedicated women and men who represent the spirit of voluntarism across the broad spectrum of our Jewish community.

Because we strengthen each other – Together We're Stronger.

HISTORIC COMMUNITY MISSION

It was a spectacular week in Israel for the more than 300 Toronto participants of UJA Federation's B'yachad Solidarity Mission. They were part of a 600 strong Canadian contingent who, while in Israel, volunteered at social service agencies, and attended Canada Salutes Israel at the Palmachim Air Force Base. More than 700 IDF soldiers joined mission members in a celebration and heard a special address by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. For information on upcoming UJA Federation missions, call 416-631-5680 or e-mail: amalka@ujafed.org

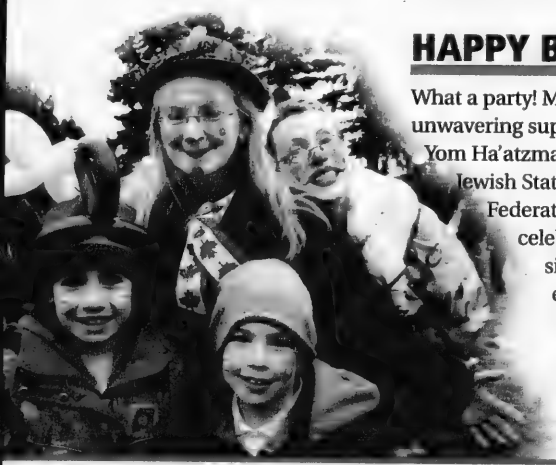
UJA FEDERATION

RALLY AGAINST ANTISEMITISM

In a strong show of unity, more than 3,000 community members attended a standing-room-only rally against antisemitism and hatred at the Leah Posluns Theatre, co-sponsored by UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region. Joining the crowd were federal, provincial, municipal and religious leaders.

EVERY CALL COUNTED!

UJA Federation's Campaign 2004 community telethons were a phenomenal success due to hundreds of dedicated volunteers who took to the phones and thousands of committed donors who answered the call. On Super Sunday alone, over $200,000 was raised - that's a remarkable $3,333 per minute from this deeply committed community!



HAPPY BIRTHDAY, ISRAEL!

What a party! More than 3,000 people showed their unwavering support for Israel at Earl Bales Park on Yom Ha'atzmaut – Israel's Independence Day – to mark the Jewish State's 56th birthday. Sponsored by UJA Federation and the Israel Now Consortium, the celebration offered fun for the whole family with singing, dancing, activities for children, entertainment and kosher Israeli food. The Israel Now Consortium is comprised of more than 115 community organizations united in solidarity with Israel, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

IF IT'S MADE IN ISRAEL, MAKE IT YOURS!

Buy Israeli, an initiative of the Israel Now Consortium, demonstrates how every single Jewish consumer in the Greater Toronto Area can make a significant difference to Israel's economy. More than 90 retail establishments have embraced this project by promoting and selling Israel-made products. Short of traveling to Israel, Buy Israeli is an exceptional way to help Israel on an ongoing basis. For a complete list of products and merchants, visit www.jewishtoronto.com

JEFF DICKER

"I work in a firm to feed my family. I volunteer at UJA Federation to feed my soul. I am constantly inspired and uplifted by the dedication of my colleagues on the Community Engagement Committee as we strive to make meaningful contributions to Jewish life in Greater Toronto."

Holocaust Centre of Toronto

MAX EISEN

"I volunteer as a survivor speaker because of my personal experiences during the events of the Shoah. The effect of our cry 'Never Again' does not come about without historical evidence as well as transmitting pertinent information so people can make connections to the recent past."

Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto

AL REINSTEIN

"Voluntarism has been an integral part of our family life. When I retired, I wanted to reconnect with the community that treated me so well during my professional career. Working with JIST fulfils this need because of the multi-faceted assistance we offer."

Ontario Jewish Archives

DR. SYDNEY WISE

"I find it constantly exciting to come across material, particularly photographs of people or places that I knew personally or knew about many years ago, and to be able to identify them for the OJA staff."

Women's Campaign & Advocacy

HELEN SILVERSTEIN

"It has been a privilege for me to volunteer for UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy and have the opportunity to work with very dedicated women who share a common goal of helping to strengthen the Jewish community here, in Israel and around the world."

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow

JACK CHISVIN

"We read in the Talmud 'a dream never shows the impossible,' so five years ago those who dreamed about a home for Jewish students at the U of T didn't see the impossible. I have gained much from Hillel ever since my student days at the University of Manitoba until today. It is my good fortune to have been able to give back that which I have received and made that impossible dream come true."

LOU GREENBAUM

"I am privileged to be part of a team of talented professional individuals that are responsible for building upon the community's vision to create a campus for Jewish communal life in the City of Vaughan – one that will become a world showcase. Toronto's Jewish community is unique in its ability to respond to many challenges we Jews face both at home and abroad, and I am grateful for the opportunities it has afforded me to serve in many capacities as a volunteer."

A Strong Jewish Voice

In today's troubled world, in which we are witnessing a resurgence of worldwide antisemitism and other disturbing developments, it is imperative for us to strengthen our collective Jewish voice.

The new Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), strongly supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, offers all of us this crucial opportunity.

As Canada's key coordinating body for Israel and Jewish advocacy, CIJA believes in vigorous action on issues of urgent Jewish concern. Through its proactive, research-based strategies, CIJA responds rapidly to those concerns on behalf of all Jewish Canadians.

The organization's grassroots membership arm, CIJA-PAC (Public Affairs Committee), encourages direct participation by thousands of Canadians in the important process of influencing national leaders on critical issues. For just $18 annually, CIJA-PAC offers members a wealth of education on key concerns and the chance to translate knowledge into action. To join CIJA-PAC, visit www.cija.ca or www.jewishtoronto.com – the UJA Federation web site.

Strengthening our Jewish voice depends on the most active possible participation by members of our community in order to build a secure Jewish future.

Marc Levy (l) and Mark Waldman encourage membership in CIJA-PAC at UJA Federation's recent Walk with Israel.

Chief Sephardi rabbi wants to bridge gap between Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Religious institutions in Israel have been seriously affected by steps taken earlier this year to dismantle the country's Ministry of Religious Affairs, Rabbi Shlomo Amar, the chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel, said last week.

"It's a very terrible situation," with both psychological and practical implications, he told The CJN in an interview immediately preceding his June 14 lecture at the Sephardic Kehila Centre. Speaking in Hebrew for both the interview and the lecture, Rabbi Amar was accompanied by Rabbi Amram Assayag, spiritual leader of the centre's Abir Yaakob Congregation, who translated his words into English.

Budgets for religious services, including mikvahs and kashrut, have been "neglected," Rabbi Amar said, adding

Always defended legitimacy of Israel: Martin

Paul Martin

Paul Martin, Canada's 21st prime minister, was elected leader of the Liberal Party of Canada on Nov. 14, 2003, and his government was sworn in on Dec. 12, with a promise to change the way things work in Ottawa through sweeping parliamentary reforms.

Martin is the MP for LaSalle-Emard in Montreal. He was first elected in 1988. In 1990, he ran for the leadership of the Liberal party, finishing second.

After the election of the Liberals in 1993, he served as finance minister until June, 2002. His chief claim to fame in that post is erasing Canada $42 billion deficit, paying down $36 billion in debt and recording five consecutive balanced budgets.

CJN reporter Ron Csillag interviewed him by telephone last Thursday.

CJN: Our readers have sensed an increasing lack of support for, and sometimes hostility toward, Israel on the part of the Liberal government since 1993. What can you say to allay those concerns and would policy toward Israel and the Middle East change under a Martin government?

Martin: Well, first of all, I do not accept the premise of your question. I believe the Liberal government has always defended the legitimacy of the Jewish state of Israel and I have stated publicly on many occasions that I do not believe there is any moral equivalence between defending one's country and terrorists who blow up innocent women and children. So, as far I'm concerned, Israel is a democracy and it also has a lengthy history in this country of being very strongly supported.

Jews Make Top 100

EDMONTON — Four Jews were named to a list of 100 "Edmontonians of the Century" last month as part of the city's 100th anniversary celebrations. The four are author and publisher Mel Hurtig; the late clothing retailer Henry Singer; the late developer Jacob Ghermezian, patriarch of the family that built the West Edmonton Mall; and the late Joe Shoctor, who founded the Citadel Theatre and co-founded the Edmonton Eskimos football club. They were chosen by the city's Celebrate 2004 committee from among 900 candidates, including 10 Jews nominated by the Jewish community. Biographies of the 100 honorees will be published in a book to coincide with Edmonton's 100th birthday in October.

WORLD

Deportation Allowed

NEW YORK — A U.S. judge ruled last week that former concentration camp guard Jakiw Palij, 80, can be deported to his native Ukraine, based on Palij's service as a guard at the Trawniki forced-labour camp and the fact he concealed his service when he applied to immigrate to the United States in 1949. Palij lives in New York City. The case was brought by the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations.

JDLer to Face Trial

LOS ANGELES — A U.S. judge last week voided a plea bargain reached with Jewish Defence League member Earl Krugel. Without giving details, the judge said Krugel, 61, had breached the plea bargain in which he agreed to plead guilty to plotting to bomb a mosque and the offices of Lebanese-American Republican Congressman Darrell Issa. Krugel's co-defendant, former JDL leader Irv Rubin, committed suicide in jail. Krugel's trial is to start in November.

Extremist Elected

LONDON — A Jewish woman has been elected to a local municipal council as a candidate for a far-right British political party. Patricia Richardson was one of three British National Party members to win seats on the Epping Forest Council near London. Richardson denies the party is anti-Semitic and promotes Holocaust denial. "I think that is way, way back in the past," she said in the campaign. Richardson, who says her two sons have been circumcised, has few links to the Jewish community.

Man in Custody in Yeshiva Student's Stabbing

PARIS — A man is under judicial investigation in France for attempting to murder a yeshiva student in a knife attack in Epinay-sur-Seine, a suburb north of Paris, earlier this month.

Eskander Guessine, described as an unemployed bookkeeper, is suspected of stabbing Yisrael Yifrah, 17, outside the Mekor Yisrael Yeshiva and of involvement in at least seven other knife attacks. The other knifings targeted non-Jews, but the investigation notes a racial motive in the initial attack, which would mean a longer jail sentence if Guessine is subsequently charged and convicted. He remains in police custody.

In the attack, a large man described as being of North African heritage yelled "God is great" in Arabic before stabbing Yifrah in the chest. Yifrah's condition has improved since an operation last week.

Save Tajik Shul: WJC

NEW YORK — The World Jewish Congress has urged UNESCO, the UN agency that deals with historic preservation, to help save the only synagogue in Dushanbe, the capital of Tajikistan, from being destroyed to make room for a presidential palace. The government has offered the small and mostly elderly Jewish community land for a new shul.

UN Warns Caterpillar

NEW YORK — Jean Ziegler, the UN's special expert on the right to food, last week warned Caterpillar to stop selling bulldozers to the Israeli army. He said if the U.S.-based firm keeps doing so, it may be seen as an accomplice in violating Palestinian human rights, since soldiers use them "to destroy agricultural farms, greenhouses and ancient olive groves." Israel says it uses the bulldozers to raze terrorists' homes. Caterpillar shareholders recently rejected a proposal to stop selling the bulldozers.

Madonna now 'Esther'?

NEW YORK — Madonna, known for her interest in Jewish mysticism, has taken the name Esther. "I wanted to attach myself to the energy of a different name," she told ABC's 20/20 in an interview. Madonna's latest book, Yakov and the Seven Thieves, is slated to be published this week.

Oz to Appeal Sentence

PERTH — The Australian government plans to appeal the sentence of a Muslim convert who plotted to bomb the Israeli Embassy in Canberra. Jack Roche received nine years in jail after becoming the first person convicted under new anti-terror laws. The maximum penalty was 25 years in jail, but after spending 18 months in custody, and with possible early release for good behaviour, he could be out in 2007.

Dallaire recounts Rwanda genocide

Tribute held to Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ten years ago, as upwards of 800,000 men, women and children were being brutally slaughtered in equatorial Africa, the world watched, listened – and refused to act.

The situation was similar to that of the 1930s, said Lt.-Gen. (ret.) Romeo Dallaire, the Canadian officer who headed the UN's peacekeeping force in Rwanda at the time. "They were too busy" to intervene.

Speaking at a tribute to Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal earlier this month, Dallaire noted that despite being informed of events, Western states determined that Rwanda had no strategic value. Instead, they sent troops and spent billions in Yugoslavia even though the killing in Rwanda dwarfed the atrocities in that white, European state. The only troops European nations sent to Rwanda were to help expatriates leave, along with the booty they took home.

"We watched and didn't want to get involved," said Dallaire, who has written a book about his experiences, Shake Hands with the Devil.

During the genocide that began in April 1994, local killers were encouraged by stations that broadcast "hate radio… and described people as cockroaches." The killers pulled fetuses from bodies and decapitated fathers in front of their children, Dallaire recounted.

Tormented by his experiences in Rwanda, Dallaire has repeatedly spoken about the atrocities he witnessed and has testified at the war crimes tribunal for Rwanda that convenes in Arusha, Tanzania.

Wiesenthal's record of pursuing Nazi killers, including notorious concentration camp commandants, was recounted by a number of speakers at the tribute, which was attended by 1,400 people. Wiesenthal, 95, is too frail to travel and a retrospective on his life was delivered on video and in comments from representatives of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. In addition, Awards of Valour were presented to Max Eisen, Shirley Anne Haber, Irshad Manji and Yaakov Roth for standing up to intolerance.

Dallaire recounted that in 1994, he met personally with the "devils" who were committing atrocities, negotiating with militia leaders whose clothes were bloodstained from their involvement in killings.

Lt.-Gen. (ret.) Romeo Dallaire

Dallaire said that Rwandans sometimes congregated in churches, mistakenly believing they'd find refuge there. Yet their killers – Hutu extremists – did not respect the sanctuary. They threw grenades into church windows and used machetes to kill those who fled.

More election reflections

This is the final issue of the paper before the election next Monday. Due to the quirks of our production schedule, we will not be publishing any further election stories until the issue of July 8. That is because our next issue, namely July 1, actually goes to press on voting day, June 28 and will arrive in readers' homes after the results of the election are known.

But the electioneering in recent days evokes the following further reflections.

• The Debate (1)

That this television event was called a debate is an egregious misnomer. It could have perhaps should have more accurately been called a staged, four-ring argument.

If our children around the dinner table behaved as did the leaders during the English language debate, we would have sent them away from the table.

In a schoolyard, that behaviour usually lands the offending children in the principal's office.

Why should we accept such feuding, quarrelsome and downright rude behaviour from the men who lead our federal political parties? Like many people with whom I spoke the following day, I simply turned away from the politicians' performances after a while.

The blame for their comportment, of course, does not rest entirely with the leaders. The television networks are also to blame. Irascible misbehaviour provides better entertainment than it does civil discourse.

And that is the crux of a television "debate." In keeping with the television industry's core ethos, the "debate" must be a show as well as a vehicle for providing information.

But as a vehicle for providing useful, substantive information about the policies and qualities we require from an aspiring prime minister, it is very poor.

It is past time for the political parties and the networks to devise a format for the "debate" that is truer to the needs of democracy rather than to putting on a good show.

• The Debate (2)

It was unfair in the English-language debate to exclude the leader of the Green Party. The Green Party is running candidates in all 308 federal ridings. The Bloc Quebecois is fielding candidates in one province only.

Organizers of the "debate" cannot justify the decision on the basis of a comparison of the total popular vote for the two parties. For the Bloc receives no popular vote in nine of the 10 provinces.

If the Green Party is a serious political movement – and the fielding of 308 candidates might suggest that it is – its leader should have been afforded the opportunity to join the "debate."

• The Bloc Québécois.

If the election yields a minority government situation, it would be unconscionable for the either the Conservatives or the Liberals to attempt to form a government with the Bloc.

Lest it be forgotten, the Bloc's raison d'etre is to achieve the secession of Quebec from Canada. Their key objective, therefore, is the dismantling of the country.

The federalist parties must declare without equivocation the unacceptability in principle of any alliance with the Bloc. There should be no political partnership with the Bloc, whether for expedient or for tactical purposes.

There could be negative economic ramifications for Canada in international markets if investors were to see a new government relying for its stability upon secessionist forces.

Beyond the possible harmful economic ramifications of a Bloc-based minority government, however, are the fundamentally unwelcome domestic ramifications of such a collaboration.

It would set a bad example, once again, for the younger generation regarding political power – namely, that principle must surrender to expedience for the sake of holding power.

In addition, of course, the constant spotlight shining on the Bloc would necessarily also shine on the cause of separatism.

As anyone at The CJN can attest, emotions within the community over this election are running high. People are engaged, people are involved and people are committed to their favourite candidates. And that is as it should be.

The freedom to choose is the most precious jewel in the crown of democracy. Whom we choose as our candidate is, of course, very important. But far more important is that we choose.

There is nearly a week left in the campaign. For those of us still uninvolved, undecided or confused about our choices, there is still sufficient time to be become involved or to sort out our choices. To guide us in our choices or in the myriad ways we can become involved, I remind readers of the helpful election resource available from the political action committee (CIJA-PAC) of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

With the collaboration of the Canada-Israel Committee and of the Canadian Jewish Congress, CIJA-PAC has compiled a superb election primer. It can be accessed at www.feduja.org/evites/cija-pac-election-english

I urge everyone who is eligible to vote next week. It is very important that we do so. —MBD

Fire destroys Island Yacht Club structure

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Children playing with matches may have been responsible for the fire on Sunday that destroyed the clubhouse of the mostly Jewish Island Yacht Club (IYC) on Mugg's Island south of downtown Toronto.

Despite the fire, which gutted the club's dining facilities and locker area, the IYC should remain open for business for the rest of the boating season, said the club's commodore, Bruce Bussin.

"The spirit of the club will carry on," he said. "Our members are distraught today, but we're already working at rebuilding our club. Our membership has a strong spirit, a strong determination to see our clubhouse return."

The six-alarm blaze began at around 5 p.m. on Sunday in a grassy area behind the clubhouse, but quickly spread. The wooden structure was engulfed by flames, and despite the efforts of staff to snuff out the fire using extinguishers, it grew out of control. Firefighters were hampered by lack of access to Mugg's Island, shuttling to the island by boat.

At times, flames reached as high as 10 metres and four firefighters were injured fighting the blaze. No club members were hurt.

In addition to losing the clubhouse, memorabilia stretching back to the club's founding 52 years ago were also destroyed. "For me, that's the worst loss," said Bussin. "The rest is wood, paint, nails, wiring and plumbing. All that can be rebuilt. The biggest loss… besides the memories and the vista is our trophies and memorabilia, including the portraits of past commodores."

None of the club's boats was damaged, while the IYC's swimming pool, tennis courts and playground were also unaffected. Bussin suggested the club will try to bring in a temporary structure until the clubhouse is rebuilt.

He said the club's executive met later in the day on Sunday and decided to maintain as much of the club's schedule as possible. The highly regarded junior sailing program, which attracts about 100 youths age seven to 16, will continue as planned. The program has produced numerous talented sailors, including the top two finishers at the 2003 Canadian Youth Championships, Ethan Holtzer and Isaac Bussin (Bruce's nephew).

The club will once again provide a sailing day of respite for families coping with their children's illnesses, in conjunction with the Starlight Foundation.

The IYC was founded in 1952 at a time when Jews were denied membership in established yachting clubs. Club membership today stands at around 150 families (300 people), with a smaller number of associate and junior members.

Visiting rabbi defends early Jewish reformers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Was Reform Judaism a mistake? In a word, no, says Rabbi Sanford Ragins, the senior rabbi emeritus of Leo Baeck Temple in Los Angeles.

He is troubled, however, by what he perceives as a lack of empathy among critics of early Jewish reformers, he told listeners at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill on a recent Sunday morning.

Rabbi Ragins, who was ordained from Hebrew Union College and has a PhD in the history of ideas from Brandeis University, is an adjunct professor in the Religious Studies Department at Occidental College in L.A. and a faculty member of the Lutheran Institute for Church and Judaism in Berlin, Germany.

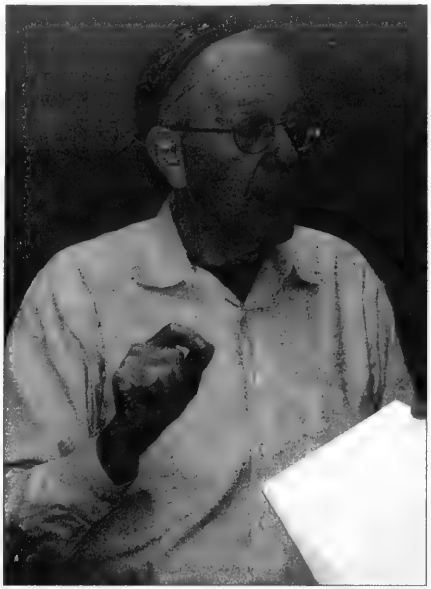
He spent a weekend at Har Zion as a visiting scholar to discuss his views on Reform Judaism and offer a historical perspective.

Even before the Holocaust, in western Europe – and more recently in North America – there has been a sense among many Reform rabbis that "a huge mistake" was made when Jews were emerging from the ghetto into the surrounding society more than 200 years ago, said Rabbi Ragins.

"There's a sense that… they made a horrendous mistake in throwing away something that was precious and beautiful, and that since then we in the Reform community have been seeking to find our way 'back' and reappropriating some [traditions] that have been abandoned."

Present-day Jews, given the context of widespread anti-Semitism and isolation their ancestors had faced in the late Middle Ages and early modern times, "would probably make exactly the same decisions," Rabbi Ragins contended.

To support his case, the rabbi distributed 11 pages of documentation, including a comment by philosopher David Friedlaender, founder in 1778 of the first Jewish Free School in Berlin, who predicted that Judaism would "collapse into ruin" if "competent, daring builders" did not "repair" it.



Speaking at Temple Har Zion recently, Rabbi Sanford Ragins said that Reform Judaism "rose out of responding to modernity" and the perception that Judaism was "dead or dying." [Frances Kraft photo]

With the coming of the Enlightenment in the 18th century, said Rabbi Ragins, "all kinds of traditional and medieval [political, economic and religious] concepts were challenged" among the intellectuals and the rising middle class in western Europe.

Until the early 1800s, said Rabbi Ragins, there was no such thing as "the Jewish Frenchman." Previously, he explained, "there were [only] Jews who lived in France." Likewise, he added, the Jews of 19th-century Germany, were "largely Germanized."

Reform Judaism "rose out of responding to modernity" and the perception that Judaism was "dead or dying," said Rabbi Ragins.

An increase in Jews converting to Christianity – in some cases as a prerequisite for teaching at a university – did not necessarily reflect a change in belief, he noted.

A few radical reformers, whose early pronouncements included rejection of circumcision and renouncing the authority of the Talmud, were responding to a "crisis" by making changes that were "radical – [literally] down to the roots." They were not part of the mainstream Reform movement, Rabbi Ragins said.

At the same time, noted Rabbi Ragins, modern Orthodoxy was also emerging in Germany.

He contends that Reform Judaism was developed "not because we want[ed] to kill Judaism, but because we want[ed] to save it from obsolescence and decrepitude... It was a reasonable option."

Today, Rabbi Ragins told The CJN, Reform Judaism continues its role as a "response to modernity. I see it exactly the same way."

JVS Toronto, Israel Elwyn unite to aid disabled

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Funds raised from a recent theatre evening at Famous People Players, sponsored by Jewish Vocational Service Toronto and Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, will benefit people with disabilities both locally and in Israel.

In Toronto, the money will support programs at the Al Green Resource Centre to facilitate transitions from a sheltered workshop environment to employment, and in Israel funds are earmarked for Israel Elwyn's Dvora Agmon Preschool Development Center.

Through a number of services that also include adult development centres, supported employment services and transitional employment programs, Israel Elwyn provides more than 1,000 children and adults with special needs with the tools needed to lead more independent lives within the community.

Karen Goldenberg, CEO of JVS Toronto, says the two organizations teamed up after she met Israel Elwyn's executive director, David Marcu, in Israel, and learned that a Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn had been started up by Mannie Rotman, a past chair of JVS Toronto.

"David Marcu said that the Canadian Friends needed to move forward and attract another generation of volunteers, so we began to work with a [new] group, and we put together a new board," says Goldenberg.

"Israel Elwyn's significant focus is on preparing people for the world of work, and that is our communal interest," says Goldenberg, who visits a different Israel Elwyn program each year.

Mickey Milner, past chair of JVS Toronto, says that Israel Elwyn serves people of all ages across the country. "It caters to kids, and it has excellent rehabilitation centres."

Based on a program that has 10 Israel Elwyn clients working at Hadassah Hospital, says Goldenberg, JVS Toronto applied to the Ontario Disability Support Program, and received funding to begin a hospital-based pilot project here.

"We were inspired by the program in Israel. That kind of sharing often occurs. The idea that organizations can cross-fertilize continues to be a valid way of learning," she says.

They chose an evening at Famous People Players for their first joint fundraiser, "because it is a wonderful venue in which people with developmental disabilities are involved in all aspects of a show that is as good as any Broadway performance.

"It is particularly meaningful because it showcases the potential of people with disabilities. It is an inspirational program that demystifies the myth of what is possible."

JIAS helps immigrant artists mount exhibition

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

When Paula Slimovich moved from Buenos Aires to Toronto last year, she found it hard to make connections in her new home.

Slimovich, an artist, told the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto (JIAS) how difficult it has been for her to establish herself in the city.

"She said, 'What am I going to do? I'm an artist and I don't know anyone here,'" said Janis Roth, executive director of JIAS Toronto.

When JIAS staff discovered that other immigrant artists were experiencing the same challenges as Slimovich, they created the New Immigrants' Art Exhibition, which runs until July 11 at the Koffler Centre of the Arts in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

"These artists need an opportunity to gain exposure here," said Suzanne Solnik, a community development and integration worker at JIAS.

"They are all new to the community and they don't have networks of people they know."

The exhibit displays the works of six new immigrant artists from Argentina, Israel, Mexico and the former Soviet Union.

The art ranges from "abstract to real life to photography," and illustrates the different styles of the artists, who, in addition to Slimovich, also include Moy Volcovich, Merav Sagiv, Yivgeni Matoussov, Peter Gur and Sergey Popov.

"Some of the artists are well-known in their own countries, but they need to gain exposure here," said Solnik.

Volcovich, the only artist in the exhibit who is not a JIAS client, said he wanted to be involved in this exhibition, "to show [his] work here in Canada, because here in Canada, nobody knows [him]."

Volcovich's photographs on display are taken from his book Una Semana en la Vida del CDI (One Week in the Life of the JCC), and show the different activities taking place at the Jewish community centre in Mexico City.

Sagiv, who came to Canada five months ago from Israel, said she included her paintings in the exhibit because she "wants to feel that [she] belongs somewhere" and "meet other artists.

"I thought this was a good place to start," she said.

Matoussov, 17, and the youngest artist in the exhibit, said it wasn't hard to select the paintings he wanted to display.

"I just chose those that I liked best," he explained.

Roth said the exhibit provides the artists with "an opportunity to do what they did in their homeland, here [in Toronto]."

TEACHERS TO STUDY AT YAD VASHEM:

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has funded three scholarships – two in memory of Ted Libfeld of Toronto and one in memory of Robert Rogow of Vancouver – to send nine Canadian teachers to Jerusalem for three weeks this summer to study at the Yad Vashem International School for Holocaust Studies. Seen, back row from left, are Dana Cohen, Thomas Penney, Audrey Gerwing, Canadian society education co-chair Rouhama Danto, Michele Root and Joan Shapero. Front row, from left, are Margaret Darmanin and Audrey Ferrer. The others teachers were Rochelle Gamlie of Winnipeg and Paul Gowan of Ottawa.

THIS MONDAY, VOTE.

To know when and where to vote, consult your voter information card. It includes all the information you'll need to use your right to vote, and you'll get through the voting process more quickly if you have it with you.

Voting hours for your polling station are indicated on your voter information card and on the Elections Canada Web site at www.elections.ca by clicking on the Voter Information Service icon.

If you haven't received this card, you are probably not on the voters list. To be able to vote, all you have to do is go to your polling station on election day and present an official document that includes your name, address and signature. If you do not have such a document, you will be given the opportunity to swear that you are eligible to vote at the polling station you are in, as long as you are accompanied by a voter registered in the same polling division who can vouch for your identity.

Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel

Visit us at www.liberalsforisrael.com

Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel is a special caucus of like-minded MPs and Senators who came together in 2003 to work with the Canadian Government to improve our foreign policy towards the Middle East and combat resurgent anti-Semitism in Canada.

Over the past year, our Members have:

- Submitted a significant foreign policy critique, entitled Canada and the Middle East, which urged Canada to combat the deligitimization and demonization of Israel, in the international arena and to curtail the 'cycle of violence' rhetoric, condemn terrorism against Israel, improve votes at the UN and establish a broad Friendship Treaty with Israel.
- Successfully led the push for a complete ban on Middle Eastern terrorist groups, including the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, Hamas, Hizballah and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.
- Opposed the licensing of the satellite channel Al Jazeera in Canada before the CRTC, arguing that it "...will contravene our hate law regulations by demonizing the Jewish people and ... will endanger the public good through anti-Semitic incitement...."
- Achieved a greater sensitivity from the Canadian government to the plight of Israelis living under the shadow of terror, resulting in more forceful and numerous condemnations of Palestinian terror.

Iran's mischief, the world's woes

The security situation along Israel's northern border became somewhat more complicated last week. Hezbollah fired anti-aircraft shells from Lebanon into Israel on the weekend, hitting an Israel Defence Forces base. No one was injured. The IDF retaliated within hours, striking at a Hezbollah base in south Lebanon. It was the third volley in two weeks by the the radical Shi'ite Iranian surrogates against the Jewish state.

Many people believe Hezbollah's escalation of activity against Israel is tied to increased scrutiny by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) of Iran's nuclear activities. The New York Times reported that "Iran was formally rebuked by the IAEA last Friday in a resolution that sharply criticized the Iranian government for a lack of co-operation in disclosing the details of its nuclear program," and again urged Iran to stop trying to create enriched uranium.

This time, however, the resolution departed from precedent. Its sponsors were Britain, France and Germany, and it passed unanimously, unimpeded by interventions from Iran's usual "protectors," Russia and China. Iran's dissembling and duplicity have begun to worry even its close friends.

It is widely known that Iran is hiding important information concerning its nuclear activities and in particular its feverish efforts to produce weapons-grade uranium. It has repeatedly stated that its nuclear program is geared only to producing electricity. But the IAEA is skeptical, as it should be. There is simply too much evidence to the contrary. Even the promise Iran made last October to the IAEA to suspend its low-grade uranium enrichment activity has proven to be worthless.

The IAEA is now investigating reports that Iran may have conducted forbidden nuclear activities on a secret site, which in some reports has been identified as Lavizan Shiyan, a military facility near Tehran. According to the Times, "commercial satellite images indicate that Iran razed buildings and removed topsoil from the area." A sampling of the soil would have enabled experts to detect the type of nuclear-related activity, if any, that had been performed there. In addition, with breathtaking gall, despite the "before and after" photos, Iranian officials have denied the existence of any buildings on that site.

Earlier in the month, reports circulated that some 10,000 Iranians have signed up for suicide attacks on Israel and U.S.-led forces in Iraq. Last week, U.S. intelligence agents claimed Hezbollah had sent a number of its agents into Iraq to operate against American-led forces. There are also reports that the co-operation between the Hezbollah and Al Qaeda is extensive. And now, once again, Hezbollah – Iran's surrogates in south Lebanon – have decided to raise the security temperature along Israel's northern border.

Iran's mischief must not be ignored; the potential for harm to the western world is too great. Now is the time for the West to show its resolve against the extremist Iranian theocracy.

Young Jew expresses opinion

I find it truly amazing that Ron Singer would actually attack Yaakov Roth's criticism of Keith Landy ("Criticism of Landy unfair," letter to the editor, CJN, June 10). Singer paints the two leading parties in Canada as if they are essentially equals on the question of Israel. The only problem with this reasoning is that the Liberal party consistently supports blatant anti-Israel resolutions at the UN, funds the Palestinian Authority with no accountability and ignores Hamas charities that actually fundraise openly in Canada with full knowledge of the Liberal government. On the other hand, for years leading Conservative MPs have been the strongest advocates of Israel's right to self-defence and have rarely, if ever, condemned legitimate Israeli operations against terrorists. One can blindly ignore the past or realize this trend and wake up to reality.

Young Jews like Roth and myself support the Conservative party because they are so clearly on Israel's side in the current war.

I hope the average Jewish voter can see that support for Israel and stopping terrorist activity in Canada begins with a vote for the Conservative party.

Youngest candidate

Frances Kraft's article on the federal candidates in the Eglinton-Lawrence riding ("Youngest candidate seeking seat in Toronto riding," CJN, June 10) could have been more helpful if readers would have been given a more thorough understanding of Max Silverman's position vis-à-vis Israel. Perhaps The CJN did not wish to appear unduly focused on Israel as an election issue, but readers are not well-served when they are simply told that Silverman "tried (unsuccessfully) to have the controversial film Jenin, Jenin screened at his high school."

This movie promotes the view that members of the IDF perpetrated a massacre in Jenin; that they executed disabled Palestinians; and that they crushed Palestinians with an army tank as they lay bound and helpless on the ground. And what is Silverman's personal opinion of this film? He is on record as describing it as a "beautiful film." May we all be spared such beauty. Those who look to their federal representatives to advocate (or at least maintain an open mind) on Israel's behalf should look elsewhere.

Canadian Jews helped defeat enemy

Cpl. Barney Gordon is not a household name. He was a Toronto Jewish Junction "boy" who served with me in a Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) mobile signals unit attached to the army. We left Southampton a few days after D-Day on a landing ship tank. Later, during the Cannes-Falaise tank battle with the Nazis, Barney was dispatched to that front – the only unit member to be so privileged. He returned a shaken man – Falaise is recorded in military history as one of the most vicious of all tank battles.

Canadian Jews are proud of the contribution and sacrifices the Jewish enlisted men made in World War II. People we know, and knew, like Maj. Ben Dunkelman, Wing Cmdr. Sydney Shulemson and Maj. Eddie Goodman made individual heroic efforts.

On D-Day, Jewish servicemen included Sgt. Freddy Harris of Toronto, killed by a German bullet as he alighted from his landing ship tank; Goodman, Sgt. Si Goldenthal and Capt. Barney Danson.

Capt. Ted Herman, Pte. Max Schwartz and Cpl. Sam Romberg (who, among others, experienced action in Normandy's Cannes/Falaise Gap) soon followed them.

The RCAF was an important strategic member of the invasion forces and included, on D-Day and later, beloved members of our Jewish community, among them Pilot Officer Harry Glass, Flight Lieut. Sammy Kwinter, Mel Isenberg, Flying Officer Barry Caplan, Flying Officer Ab Shuman, Sgt. Solly Kay, Warrant Officer Jack Spiegel, Flight Lieut. Wilf Canter (who later served in Israel's War of Independence) and Squadron Leader David Goldberg.

The above are but a handful of our Canadian Jewish boys who helped silence the enemy.

Prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King, in a letter to Canadian Jewish Congress, dated March 20, 1947, praised the Canadian Jewish contribution to World War II: "For them, World War II was not a way of life, but life itself... they fought not only for survival but for freedom."

An amazing learning trip

Earlier this year, teenagers from junior high schools across Canada had the opportunity to take part in a trip to Washington, D.C., to learn about the Holocaust as a part of the Asper Foundation Holocaust and Human Rights Program. Approximately 330 teens from Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax took part.

To prepare for the trip, we first undertook 16 hours of group sessions and 16 hours of community service. On May 2, each group arrived in Washington, D.C.

Participants toured with their own city group, but students from all the cities met on bus rides, in evening programs and for group sessions.

The main purpose of the four-day trip was the visit to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, but we also visited several monuments and memorials throughout Washington, as well as the Smithsonian museums. We also saw a play at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

The trip was an amazing experience that allowed us to learn about the Holocaust, meet new people, bond with peers, visit a beautiful city and have an overall great time.

On behalf of all the participants from all the cities, I would like to thank the Asper Foundation for the opportunity to take part in this outstanding program.

Middle class day school parents face crisis

By JERROLD LANDAU

Over the past few years, a crisis has been brewing in the Jewish community that has not led to mass protests in the streets, nor rallies by the organized Jewish community. It is the quiet, almost imperceptible crisis of the middle class of Jewish parents opting out of the Jewish day school system, or, alternatively, sticking with it and compromising the financial stability of their families. The impact of this crisis on the future of the Jewish community will likely be subtle, leading to a gradual weakening of communal involvement and support for Israel in the years and decades to come.

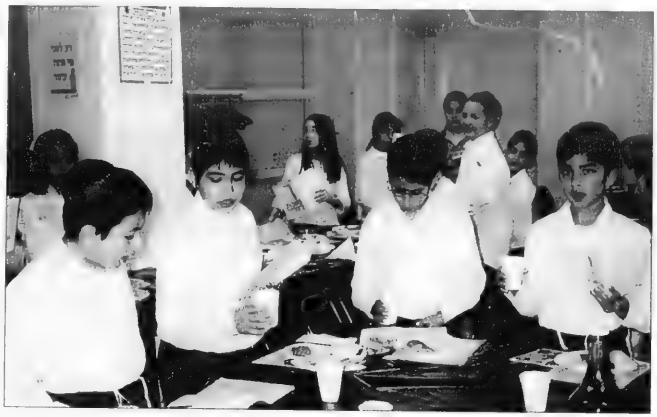
Annual tuition at the elementary level in Toronto has risen to more than $9,000 per child, while fees for high school exceed $14,000. These costs rise annually at a rate significantly higher than the rate of inflation. The situation is ameliorated somewhat by the issuing of federal charitable tax receipts for the religious component of education. But for people with more than one or two children, these fees pose a serious financial challenge, even for those who earn a respectable salary.

Based on figures from the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (provided by the schools), the net drop in day school enrolment for the 2004-2005 school year is estimated at one per cent. The drop in preschool enrolment – a very good predictor of the day school system's future health – is estimated at three per cent. Considering that the Toronto Jewish community is growing, and that the annual growth rate in day school enrolment over the past 25 years has been 4.8 per cent, these figures herald a brewing crisis. Tuition hikes for the 2004-2005 school year average five per cent.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provides more than $8 million in subsidy funds (representing just under 15 per cent of its annual fundraising campaign) for those who can't afford the full cost of tuition. This is the most generous allocation to Jewish education by any federation in North America, and, indeed, it ensures that those most in need will not be deprived of a Jewish education. Yet, it comes nowhere near to solving the growing problem.

The depth of that problem is most poignantly illustrated by examining the percentage of day school students who receive tuition subsidies in Toronto. This figure hovers at approximately 40 per cent. For Orthodox schools, where family size tends to be larger and the level of sacrifice that parents make to provide a Jewish education tends to be greater, the number exceeds a staggering 60 per cent. And the recipients of communal financial aid are not restricted to lower salary earners. Many people earning middle class salaries have joined the ranks of subsidy recipients, due to the impossibility of meeting their tuition obligations while providing for their families in a respectable manner.

These statistics should worry anyone who is concerned about the ongoing health and vigour of our community, as the effect of this situation plays itself out in two different ways, both of which are slowly eating away at the viability of our community as we know it. On the one hand, many schools are suffering from declining enrolment and high dropout rates, as parents feel they can no longer shoulder the heavy burden. On the other hand, non-wealthy families who continue to send their children to day schools despite the costs are slowly having the carpet of financial security pulled out from under them.



Students at Or Haemet preparing for Pesach

The effect of declining enrolment on the long-term health of our community is obvious. Study after study has shown there is no better predictor of continued Jewish affiliation and commitment into adulthood, and no better antidote against assimilation and intermarriage, than a day school education. That is not to say that those who do not receive a Jewish education are lost to the community – far from it. Yet, when one looks at affiliation statistics, the trends are impossible to ignore.

The financial squeeze on middle class day school parents is perhaps harder to appreciate, yet it also has a detrimental effect on the health and well-being of the community. Some parents avoid the subsidy application process for reasons of pride and self-respect, even though they would qualify for help, and choose to suffer their financial challenges in silence. Other parents find themselves earning too much to qualify for a subsidy, yet are still faced with tuition fees that cut significantly into the financial well-being of their families. Whether on subsidy or not, the ability of these families to send their children to Jewish summer camps and to contemplate trips to Israel and other such means of strengthening Jewish identity is destroyed. There are even families who forgo synagogue affiliation, leaving school as their sole source of Jewish affiliation.

> 'The community as a whole should be clamouring for change in the strongest possible manner'

As the initiative, drive and efforts of these middle class day school parents are directed toward providing the basics for their families on top of tuition that can exceed 25 per cent of their net income, their ability to participate in the organized community is severely compromised. For instance, they can give only token amounts of tzedakah to the UJA and other charities. Furthermore, as people need to work long hours and take on additional jobs to meet their obligations, the time available for communal work and family life is extremely compromised. As a result, tzedakah in Toronto is rapidly becoming a situation of the rich giving to the poor, with middle class day school parents being shoved to the sidelines.

An economically insecure middle class of day school parents does not bode well for the future of our community. When added to the opting out of day school education by less committed families, the extent of the crisis should be self-evident.

At this point, we might ask, "What can be done?"

There are two levels of response – political and communal – that must be pursued.

On the political front, the issue of government funding for our schools looms large. Ontario is the only jurisdiction in the free world that provides full funding to the school system of one religion and nothing to the schools of any other religion. The previous Conservative government introduced a measure of funding for independent schools in the form of the Equity in Education Tax Credit. When fully implemented over a five-year period, and when combined with the existing charitable credit, this measure would have provided significant relief for hard-pressed Ontario parents. Unfortunately, the current provincial Liberal government made it its first order of business to repeal the credit. This was done in a retroactive fashion, inflicting a great deal of damage on families who had already prepared their tight budgets with the EETC in mind.

The community as a whole – individuals, communal leaders, rabbis, editors of Jewish newspapers – should be clamouring for change in the strongest possible manner. If any community in Canada were being discriminated against on the basis of religion, in open and established violation of international law, we would certainly stand up and speak strongly against it. We should be doing so even more vehemently when our community is the victim of the discrimination, and when the discrimination affects a service of such importance – education – that it harms our very ability to preserve our proud, distinctive culture. We must make this issue a real priority. Politicians and political parties who look favourably on the needs of our community and are prepared to end the long-standing injustice and discrimination should be given our full support. Those who do not should be shunned.

But political action, while vital, is insufficient to address the economic squeeze on day school parents. A true solution to the crisis will involve a combination of government funding and communal support. As has been noted, the community is already allocating a significant amount of funding to Jewish education. Nevertheless, the problem continues to worsen with each passing year. Massive communal fundraising efforts, including innovative approaches such as implementing a standard five per cent estate levy for Jewish education, are desperately needed. For the near to medium term, this will also have to be coupled with a reallocation of communal funds. Our community prides itself in its very substantial financial support for Israel. A decision to keep a greater percentage of funds at home would indeed be a painful one. However, the stark choice is either to maximize support for Israel in the short term or ensure that there is a strong and viable community that will continue to be able to support Israel in the next generation. Given the current situation, our community is failing in the latter aim.

Readers of this article might claim the problem is not theirs. Not all members of the Jewish community send their children to Jewish day schools. This is a personal choice. Nevertheless, even those who have made other choices for their families must realize that the economic oppression of day school parents and mass defections from the day school system can only weaken the long-term viability of the community. The day school tuition crisis is everybody's problem.

Two choices confront the Jewish community of Ontario. Either we take strong and decisive action on both the political and the communal fronts to ameliorate, and ultimately solve, the day school tuition crisis, or we can watch the community slowly implode at its most vulnerable middle.

Jerrold Landau is the parent of four children, two who attend Jewish day school and two who will do so in the next few years. He is a longtime advocate for the affordability of Jewish day school education.

Between America and Israel

The right to criticize governmental policy is fundamental to the democratic process. We reserve that right for ourselves both internally and externally. Thus, we feel free, and safe, to criticize other countries and their policies. Offence emerges with the indiscriminate extension of that critique.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

As Jews, we may feel very protective of Israel, but we ought to acknowledge that people can disagree with specific political decisions and actions of any government. Where we part with some of our neighbours is in the spread of that critique. The Israeli government – or rabbinate or any policy-making entity – may do things that are not agreeable to all. We may voice our disapproval of such decisions or endeavours, but that does not mean all of Israel is wrong, or that Israel is bad or hateful. This type of expansion is racist. Racism occurs when a community is accused of monolithic behaviour or is charged with having one – usually negative – characteristic. It is racist to categorize all the individuals in a specific cohort as being the same or adhering to the same policy. When an entire nation is demonized, we are certainly dealing with racism and not legitimate criticism.

Hence, our protest to the world is a demand that people distinguish critique from unconditional condemnation. The State of Israel has a right to exist. It is not an evil empire.

We have seen ignorant and malicious anti-Israel sentiment shift easily into anti-Semitism. Protests begin with "down with Israel" and conclude with shouting "death to the Jews." This is racism at its very worst.

Having fought for principles of democracy and fairness and suffered the consequence of thoughtless censure and invective, how is it possible that so many Jews find comfort in their anti-Americanism? I have been present at a number of Jewish communal events where critique of American policy slides glibly into the repugnant: America is a terrible country, all its politicians are corrupt, it is a selfish nation with no redeeming characteristics. That, too, is racism and we should protest.

Whether one agrees or disagrees with the war in Iraq or current policy, we must acknowledge that America has a right to exist and that while not perfect (do we think Canada is?), it is not all bad. The world has certainly benefited from America in many ways. Americans are not ugly and America is not an evil empire. Make the comparison with our rhetoric in defence of Israel.

One final, personal perspective. I am an American and a Canadian and proud to be both. And I cannot help speculating that if someone had done to Hitler what Bush did to Saddam, we would be living in a very different world.

Shaking hands with the Devil

If there is a Canadian public servant deserving a reward in the world to come, it is Lt.-Gen. Roméo Dallaire, hero and victim of the Rwanda genocide.

When Dallaire was chosen to head the UN mission to Rwanda, he left believing that he would be able to put into action the honourable goal of UN peacekeeping missions – to restore or protect the peace in areas of conflict. That was the goal of former Canadian prime minister Lester B. Pearson, who was responsible for establishing the first UN peacekeeping force.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In Rwanda, Dallaire found a cesspool of hatred, power struggles and tribal conflicts, which escalated beyond the usual bounds of armed struggle.

The conflict quickly became a war in which women were gang-raped and murdered and children were hacked to pieces in front of their parents. People drove machetes into the skulls of their neighbours – with whom they had lived and worked for years – yet no one seemed to care.

Dallaire recounts his experiences in Rwanda in his recent book, Shake Hands With the Devil: The Failure of Humanity in Rwanda.

When he left Rwanda, he came home a broken, guilt-ridden man who had to be rescued from the brink of suicide. The dithering at the UN, the venal behaviour of some of his troops, the machinations of countries such as France and Belgium, and U.S. and Canadian indifference to Rwanda would have caused distress for anyone.

Dallaire was short of the resources he needed to prevent the warlords from inflaming their drunken militias and he was abandoned by western powers. He once met with some of the leaders of the massacres and one he encountered still had dried blood on his shirt and arm. "I felt that I had shaken hands with the devil... I had given him an opportunity to take pride in his disgusting work," Dallaire writes.

The child soldiers he met in Rwanda were either drugged or completely cowed by their experiences. Without skills, they returned to the bush or took up arms again. The girls who got pregnant after being raped were shunned.

Why am I writing about Dallaire? Because he is a hero for telling this story? Yes. But there is more.

Open the newspaper today and you will read about massacres and rapes in the Sudan and atrocities in the Congo. Zimbabwe is governed by a man so demented that every decision he makes drives his country further down.

Since 1981, the number of people in Africa living in abject poverty has increased 91 per cent.

"Attention must be paid," Willy Loman pleads in the play Death of a Salesman. Boy, do we need to pay attention.

Our current and farcical federal political campaign has paid no attention to creating a coherent foreign policy, nor has the Liberal party – or any other – articulated a clear policy for the mission of our military.

Thus we stand unready to act on the world stage in any way to undertake the peacekeeping role Pearson and Dallaire believed Canada should undertake, or be an effective player with a clear sense of foreign policy in any but a reactive mode.

Perhaps it was the western world's unwillingness to fully understand our Holocaust, the one that still resonates today, that has allowed it to ignore Rwanda. Canada, which refused to rescue Jews from Hitler's Europe, has turned its back on another slaughter.

Why should we as Jews care? We have our own crises to deal with, you might say. I disagree.

Unlike Dallaire and many others who have recognized that failure in Rwanda will inevitably lead to more death, poverty, disease and despair, Canada has not bothered to attend to the condition of the billion people on the African continent.

We are mesmerized by Asia and its successes. Yet Africa is a challenge we cannot ultimately escape. Our failure points to the lack of any credible Canadian position on foreign policy. And I haven't even mentioned AIDS.

If we cannot persuade our government to attend to our unrealized potential for good on the world stage, then we have failed to fulfil our roles both as citizens of Canada and as a mitzvah-obligated people.

Those failures will come back to haunt us. Believe it.

Here's to you, Mary Robinson

McGill University should not have given Mary Robinson, the former United High Commissioner for Human Rights, an honorary doctorate on June 4.

The recipients of such honours are meant to be examples to students. Their careers are held up for emulation. But Robinson behaved dishonourably. Her example should be avoided, not followed. During the run-up to the United Nations World Conference Against Racism, and its companion NGO Forum against Racism, held in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001, Robinson acted disgracefully.

David Matas in Winnipeg

I went to Durban for B'nai Brith Canada and became the rapporteur for the Jewish caucus. That role put me in the midst of an anti-Semitic conflagration. Robinson was around when the first sparks were lit, but she did nothing to extinguish the sparks. Instead, she fanned the flames.

While Robinson could not control anti-Zionist governments, she could control what she said and did. Her record shows that she was not prepared to stand up to attempts to turn the conference into an anti-Zionist platform. The office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights is a human rights leadership pulpit, one she abused in giving comfort to the anti-Zionist cause.

A series of preparatory regional meetings took place prior to the Durban conference, including one in Tehran for Asia, where Robinson's behaviour amounted to appeasement. Congressman Tom Lantos, the head of the U.S. delegation to Durban, wrote in a 2002 article in the Fletcher Forum of World Affairs that she took no action to overcome the ban on attendance by Israeli government representatives. In the other regional preparatory meetings, she opened the meetings with appeals to governments to recognize and confront their own present-day problems with discrimination. In Tehran, however, there was no such appeal.

In a statement to the press after the Tehran conference, which ended with a one sided, anti-Israel concluding document, she congratulated the delegates on their degree of consensus and urged them to carry on in the fight against racism. She characterized the meeting as a productive dialogue between civilizations. When asked about the inflammatory rhetoric directed at Israel, she stated, "The situation in the Palestinian occupied territories was brought up at the meeting and it is reflected in the final declaration."

At a preparatory meeting in Geneva just prior to the Durban Conference, Robinson refused to reject the notion in the draft conference text that the wrong done to the Jews in the Holocaust was equivalent to the pain suffered by the Palestinians in the Middle East. Instead, as Lantos notes, she discussed "the historical wounds" of anti-Semitism and of the Holocaust, on the one hand, and "the accumulated wounds" of displacement and military occupation on the other.

As well, instead of insisting that it was inappropriate to single out Israel in the context of a world conference on racism, she condoned it by referring to the "need to resolve protracted conflict and occupation, claims of inequality, violence and terrorism, and a deteriorating situation on the ground." Lantos writes: "It was clear to me that Mrs. Robinson's intervention during the Geneva talks represented the coup de grâce on efforts to save the [Durban] conference from disaster."

At Durban itself, Robinson cried crocodile tears. In response to the travesty of the NGO Forum's concluding declaration, she said she was "disheartened and dismayed" by the inappropriate language accusing Israel of genocide. She called the document "unacceptable and hurtful." When presented with the anti-Semitic literature being distributed there, she said: "When it comes to this, I am a Jew." All very fine, but two-faced and oblivious to her own role in bringing about this result.

In the movie The Graduate, Simon and Garfunkel hit exactly the right note with their mocking musical tribute to a woman who seduced a friend of her daughter: "Here's to you Mrs. Robinson. Jesus loves you more than you will know." Well, here's to you Mary Robinson. McGill has honoured you more than you had any reason to expect.

The Kirshner File

Reagan was both a friend and critic of Israel

Ronald Reagan had a mercurial, sometimes testy relationship with Israel in his opening four-year term as president of the United States. But generally, he was well-disposed toward Israel, being the first president to formally regard the Jewish state as a strategic ally.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Reagan, who died on June 5, the 37th anniversary of the Six Day War, assumed office in January 1981 with a strong pro-Israel track record. During the 1967 Mideast war, when he was governor of California, he attended rallies on behalf of Israel. Subsequently, he persuaded the state legislature to pass a bill authorizing banks and savings institutions to buy Israel Bonds.

Reagan's pro-Israel tilt was politically smart. In a state with a substantial Jewish community, centred mainly in Los Angeles and its suburbs, how could he not be partial to Israel? Yet Reagan's sentiments toward Jewish causes were formed before Israel's birth as a nation. As a Hollywood actor, Reagan tended to move in Jewish circles, and therefore, he did not perceive Jews as outsiders. In an impressive show of principle, he resigned from a country club in Los Angeles in 1948 over its anti-Semitic admissions policy.

Being a Republican, Reagan could easily have been cool toward Israel. After all, traditional Republicans usually perceived Israel as an impediment to better American ties with the oil-rich Arab world.

Yet Reagan's perception of Israel was different. To Reagan, who won 39 per cent of the Jewish vote in the 1980 presidential election, Israel was a staunch U.S. ally in the struggle to limit Soviet influence in the Middle East. Writing in the Washington Post in the wake of the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran, which toppled the pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy, Reagan observed: "The fall of Iran has increased Israel's value as perhaps the only remaining strategic asset in the region on which the United States can truly rely… Only by full appreciation of the critical role… Israel plays in our strategic calculus can we build the foundation for thwarting Moscow's designs on territories and resources vital to our security."

As a result of his anti-Soviet worldview, Reagan made Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union a centrepiece of his concerted campaign of pressure against Moscow. The Reagan administration nudged Moscow to liberalize its restrictive immigration policy, and by the end of his presidency in January 1989, the trickle of Jews leaving the Soviet Union had increased to something of a torrent. The imprisoned Refusenik, Anatoly (Natan) Sharansky, was one of the prime beneficiaries of this historic realignment.

But Reagan's anti-communism worked both ways. Considering Saudi Arabia a member of the anti-Soviet camp, Reagan fought a pitched battle with Jewish lobbyists after declaring his intention to sell the kingdom five specially-fitted reconnaissance airplanes, known as AWACS. The proposed sale was enthusiastically promoted by defence secretary Caspar Weinberger, a close friend of Reagan who strove to strengthen the United States' links with Saudi Arabia at Israel's expense.

Reagan knew that Menachem Begin, the Israeli prime minister, opposed the $8.5 billion transaction. But Reagan thought that Begin's opposition would be merely perfunctory. When Begin lashed out bitterly at the proposed deal, Reagan took it rather personally. But Israel's opposition was to no avail. Saudi Arabia got its AWACS.

The next crisis to roil Israel's relations with the United States unfolded in June 1981, when Israel destroyed Iraq's nuclear reactor near Baghdad. Reagan's vice-president, George Bush, denounced the attack, and in a fit of pique, the Reagan administration suspended the shipment of F-16 aircraft to Israel and voted for a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning Israel.

Ronald Reagan

Israel's raid angered Washington for two reasons. Though it had yet to re-establish diplomatic relations with Iraq, broken off by Baghdad during the Six Day War, the United States tacitly supported the Iraqis during the interminable Iran-Iraq War.

And the bombing seemed to threaten a pet policy Reagan's first secretary of state, Alexander Haig, had recently developed. Haig's "strategic consensus" doctrine was designed to weld together Western-leaning Arab countries and Israel in an informal anti-Soviet alliance. The Reagan administration was concerned that Israel's strike would undermine it. In fact, Haig's policy was a non-starter because of the refusal of Arab states to be openly associated with Israel in a pro-American entente.

In November of that momentous year, Israel's defence minister, Ariel Sharon, visited Washington, D.C., to sign and seal a Memorandum of Understanding on strategic co-operation. Coming on the heels of the setback in Iran, the agreement was meant to deter Soviet expansionism in the Middle East. The Soviets had recently invaded Afghanistan and had shored up relations with Syria, a client state of long standing, and Washington was clearly worried.

The Memorandum of Understanding would spawn joint Israeli-American military exercises and greater co-operation in intelligence gathering. The pact was expanded in 1988 as Israel was designated "a major non-NATO ally of the United States."

Less than three weeks after Sharon's visit, with the United States preoccupied by the imposition of martial law in Poland, Begin pushed through a Knesset bill applying Israeli law to the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in 1967. To Reagan, Israel's annexation of the Golan smacked of dangerous unilateralism and insensitivity to U.S. interests in the region.

In retaliation, the Reagan administration temporarily suspended the Memorandum of Understanding. Infuriated by what he considered an unfriendly act, Begin asserted that the United States had no right to preach to Israel. In a tirade, he asked, "Are we a vassal state of yours? Are we a banana republic?"

When the dust finally settled, Haig – one of the most pro-Israel figures in Washington apart from Jeane Kirkpatrick, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations – made one last effort to wrap up the faltering talks on Palestinian autonomy. He failed. Israel and Egypt could not agree on the fundamentals of an agreement.

It was left to Reagan to intervene.

On Sept. 1, 1982, he introduced the Reagan peace plan, which was hyped as the "next step" in a process that had begun with the 1978 Camp David accords, president Jimmy Carter's legacy.

Speaking of "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and their requirements," Reagan proposed a five-year transition period that would lead to Palestinian self-rule and require Israel to freeze construction of new settlements in the territories. Begin opposed the scheme. "What some call the West Bank… is Judea and Samaria, and this simple… truth will never change," he said.

During Reagan's presidency, Lebanon was a constant source of instability.

The so-called Syrian missile crisis was his baptism of fire in Lebanon. It erupted in 1981 after Israel shot down two Syrian helicopters over Mount Lebanon and Syria responded by placing ground-to-air missiles in the Bekaa Valley.

As tensions flared, Reagan appointed a seasoned Arab-American diplomat, Phillip Habib, to mediate. He hammered out a truce, but a fresh crisis emerged when the PLO stepped up its shelling of Israeli settlements in the Galilee.

On June 6, 1982, Israel attacked Lebanon. The war opened a serious though fleeting rift between Israel and the United States. Reagan was furious that Israeli forces had stormed north of a 40-kilometre security zone in southern Lebanon and had taken up positions in Beirut. And Israel's heavy aerial bombardment of Beirut in mid-August prompted Reagan to compare it to the Holocaust. The Phalangist massacre of Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps whipped up further tension and emboldened the United States to contribute a contingent of marines to a western peacekeeping force in Beirut. The marines were withdrawn after their barracks was bombed with a high loss of life.

In 1983, American diplomacy suffered a grievous blow when Syria sabotaged a peace agreement between Israel and Lebanon that the new secretary of state, George Shultz, had meticulously brokered.

Tensions flared yet again in 1985 when Jonathan Pollard, a U.S. Navy analyst, was arrested on charges of spying for Israel, and when Reagan visited an SS cemetery in Bitburg, Germany. But these incidents were offset by the signing of a free trade accord.

In 1988, the United States started a dialogue with the PLO, but it was a short-lived exercise in futility, collapsing within about a year-and-a-half.

Reagan's approach to Israel was characterized by emotion, ideology and gut politics, according to Steven Spiegel, a scholar at the University of California.

Reagan could be a passionate friend, but also a withering critic.

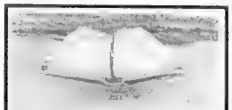
Jewish Life

An essential lesson for leaders

By RABBI RONALD WEISS



Most people believe that justice means the punishment should fit the crime, so it would appear a tremendous injustice is done to Moshe in this week's Torah reading – one imposed by none other than the Almighty himself!

In parshat Chukat, the Almighty prevents Moshe from accomplishing his life's goal of entering Eretz Yisrael.

But what exactly is Moshe's sin?

Immediately after the death of Miriam, the source of water used by the Jews in the desert disappears. Without water, they become so unruly that they eventually say it would have been better if they had died in Egypt rather than been brought "to this evil place, which is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink."

In response, God commands Moshe and Aaron to "take the rod, assemble the congregation... and speak to the rock before their eyes that it give forth water." God says this action will sanctify him in the eyes of the people who, presumably, will return from their rebellious ways.

Moshe and Aaron gather the Jews together and Moshe "lifted up his hand and smote the rock with his hand twice, causing water to come forth abundantly." But before hitting the rock, he cries out in anger, "Hear now, you rebels, are we to bring forth water out of this rock?"

In response to Moshe's anger, God becomes angry. Moshe's potential for sanctifying God before the people is found wanting. As punishment, he is told that he "shall not bring this assembly into the land which I have given them."

It's true that Moshe does not precisely follow God's instructions – instead of speaking to the rock, he strikes it. But in his defence, our commentators note that since, in the past, God had commanded Moshe to smite the rock to bring forth water, it was not unreasonable to believe the command applied to the present circumstances.

After all God instructs Moshe to take the staff with him. Was it unusual for Moshe to assume that he was to use it? Furthermore, if God wants to be sanctified via a rock that flowed with water, does it really matter whether Moshe speaks to the rock or strikes it? In either case, the miracle is clear.

The Rambam describes Moshe's punishment in terms of "displaced anger." The main problem is that Moshe calls the people rebels and loses patience with them – he wants to strike them, but hits the rock instead. A leader who is impatient or angry with his charges can't possibly bring them to the next stage of history in the Land of Israel.

What causes this change in Moshe? Up to that point, he demonstrates unlimited and unconditional love, concern and patience for the Jewish people.

Two key events in the last two Torah portions offer insight into how Moshe could move quickly from the heights of compassion for his people to the depths of impatience with their immaturity.

The first is when 10 of the 12 scouts convince the nation to despair and abandon hope of entering the Promised Land. The second is when Korach rebels against Moshe's leadership and not one Jew rises to his defence.

Perhaps these events cause Moshe's devotion to the Jews to waver. It's possible his frustration with their childishness turns into anger.

And who can blame him? The Almighty himself describes the Jews as being incredibly stubborn, a "stiff-necked people." Nevertheless, the message to Moshe, and to us, is clear: a leader must have love and compassion for those he leads, or he must relinquish his leadership to someone who can more easily provide it.

All of us, on occasion, become disappointed and even angry with the people around us. Yet, we should learn from Moshe about the impact our anger can have, and how it can help destroy everything we spend our lives building.

May we always be able to keep our disappointments and anger in perspective and not let them affect our relationships with others.

Rabbi Weiss is director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child Service.

Tragedy in one split second

Guest Voice

It was to have been the most magical weekend of their lives. All the guests had replied and family and friends were arriving from out of town. The excitement was overwhelming.

The house was being prepared. The traditional life-size picture of the bar- mitzvah boy was ready, and we, family and friends in Toronto, were all eagerly waiting to leave on our flights to Atlanta, Ga.

A beautiful, loving, brilliant young boy, Michael Benjamin Zalkin, was to be bar-mitzvahed on the first Saturday of June, in the company of his parents, brother and sister and all who loved him.

As I prepared breakfast for my youngest daughter, the phone rang. You know that queasy feeling you get in the pit of your stomach when the phone rings unexpectedly? I had it when I picked up the phone.

I had no idea the impact that phone call would make, nor was I prepared for how it would change forever the lives of so many people.

I learned that on the Thursday afternoon before his bar mitzvah, Michael was tragically struck down and killed by a truck. There was no driver in the truck, but its emergency brake had given way when Michael and his uncle were getting into their car.

It is said we are not to question God, but for me, well, who else does one ask?

As I sat in shul with my husband and my daughters on Friday night, it occurred to me that Michael would never stand on the bimah he was so proud of, nor would he read his portion from the Torah, with his parents by his side.

His rabbi said, and I quote, "Michael was a special kind of individual, one who grasped the understanding of Judaism with love and a deep understanding, a boy who would have made a difference as a man."

When I asked my rabbi for an explanation of the tragedy, he just looked at me and shook his head. Was this an answer that I was to accept?

Why did this happen to Michael and why in God's name did it happen less than 48 hours before he would stand before "HaShem, blessed be He" and prove himself worthy of becoming a respected member of the Jewish community as a man? In one split second, the lives of Michael's family had changed forever.

A bar mitzvah was booked three years ago, and within an hour, we were preparing for a funeral.

My friend, Ilana Stone, was born in Toronto, and found the love of her life, Andy Zalkin, on a blind date. They married and moved, eventually settling in Atlanta.

Again, my original question comes to mind: Where is it written that we must accept the decision of God's... plan? God giveth, and God taketh away, but how much must one endure?

It has been a life-altering experience for me, not to mention Michael's family. Their lives will never be the same, but they are blessed with another son, Adam, and a beautiful daughter, Hailey. In time, they will learn to cope with their loss and continue as a family. There is a great deal of love there, and a wonderful support system, including from members of their community.

But the most important thing that has happened in my life – if I can imagine, from this horrific ordeal, some good has come – is that I have learned that nothing in life means anything if you haven't told the people who matter to you how much you love them.

Moms and dads, sisters and brothers, remember to kiss your kids when you see them, and then kiss them again. Tell your parents how much you love them and don't lose your patience if your bubbie or zaide tells the same story again and again.

You'll never get yesterday back. There's only tomorrow.

Living with terrorism

Still Life with Bombers: Israel in the Age of Terrorism by David Horovitz Random House $38.

Since the collapse of the Oslo accords in the fall of 2000, almost 1,000 Israelis have died as victims of terror.

This book is an anguished and gripping account of how Israelis pursue their daily lives despite the attempt by Hamas and similar murderous groups to kill and maim as many Israeli civilians as possible.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author, editor of the widely read and respected biweekly magazine The Jerusalem Report, describes his friends and neighbours as on edge and angry – filled with frustration and uncertainty – and, at the same time, resilient and tenacious.

Almost everyone, Horovitz asserts, has had a close call with terrorism or knows someone who has narrowly escaped death or injury.

His wife was driving her children to school one morning last June when the 32A bus in Jerusalem exploded a few feet in front of her, the sound drowned out by loud music in the car.

"Long before the ambulances arrived," Horovitz writes, "before the first policeman had closed off the street, she passed nearby and saw the twisted metal skeleton. As her stomach lurched, she had the exceptional presence of mind to tell the kids to cover their eyes for a moment, which they did, while she executed the next right turn towards school and away from the scene."

The author indicates how Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat deliberately scuttled the peace proposals at Camp David after then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak offered "as much as, if not more than, Israel can ever offer for peace, for beyond these concessions lies only national suicide."

Arafat knew, suggests Horovitz, that the Palestinians would eventually outnumber Israelis. Today, there are just over five million Jews and 4.5 million Arabs between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. By 2020, demographers say, there will be a substantial Arab majority. And that is why, when a genuine chance presented itself at Camp David to achieve statehood for his people on almost all of the land they purported to seek, Arafat spurned it.

In this work of skilful reportage, many voices are heard, including government officials; relatives of murdered victims; suffering Arabs, deprived of basic freedom and subject to daily humiliation; Jewish settlers; peace activists; and university students from the United States.

In a detailed and revealing chapter, On the Second Battlefield, the author makes clear how much of the media, especially CNN and BBC – but also newspapers in many countries – are blatantly anti-Israel, as are many one-sided international conferences, including the 2001 NGO meeting and UN conference in Durban, South Africa. It was ostensibly dedicated to battling racism but turned into a festival of Israel bashing.

What hope is there for the future? Lisa, the author's wife, views the situation as hopeless and believes that the Palestinians will never agree to an accommodation – or that the day when they might is so distant that many thousands more will die before we reach it.

She wonders how different things would have been "had we and the Palestinians been blessed with a [Nelson] Mandela rather than an Arafat. I refuse to believe that Palestinian mothers are essentially different from Jewish and Christian mothers. I refuse to believe that their faith obliges them to regard murder and bloody, premature death as the finest ambition for their child."

The author is convinced that the only avenue for maintaining Israel as both a democratic and Jewish state is to reach negotiated settlements for territorial separation from the Palestinians. It will be possible only with a Palestinian leadership that honestly seeks coexistence, he believes.

This poignant and eloquent chronicle ends on a positive note: "My most fervent hope is that this book… can come to be read as history, an account of a bloody bygone era, since superseded by a blessed return to sanity."

Hearing impairment no barrier for bat mitzvah girl

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

As Brooke Wayne proved at her bat mitzvah on May 29, having moderate to severe hearing loss will not prevent her from achieving her goals.

Brooke Wayne

"It was one of the biggest accomplishments of my life. I'm very proud of myself for accomplishing something so big and important," she said.

"It was a blessing to work with Brooke," said Asher Tannenbaum, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation's ritual director. "She did a remarkable job. It was very emotional."

Her father, Martyn, said his daughter requires two hearing aids, but she can lip read and speak audibly, and she even listens to music.

Winning two public speaking contests for the deaf and hearing impaired in York region's junior and senior divisions has helped Brooke gain confidence in her performing abilities, he said.

And because the bimah is a lot like a stage, she was "not nervous a bit" when she read her portion in shul, he said.

"The service went very well. I wasn't nervous at all," she agreed.

Brooke began practising with Tannenbaum for her bat mitzvah last October. The two met weekly for 30 minutes, routinely running through her Torah portion, Naso, from the book Bamidbar.

"It wasn't the usual way of teaching," Tannenbaum said. "I had to burn a CD for Brooke with her portion, because the quality was better than a cassette tape."

Tannenbaum said Brooke is "a very bright individual" who always completed her homework on time.

Because some of the Hebrew words were hard for her to pronounce, Tannenbaum said he transliterated them using English letters. Mastering the cantillations, or notes, that depict the syntactic structure of the text was also made easier by mouthing the sounds and relying on eye contact, he said.

"It was a little tricky with the sounds and pronunciation. I became used to it and I learned new things," Brooke said.

Although she shared her service with another bat mitzvah girl, the spotlight narrowed when it was her turn to read from the Torah.

"There were about 500 people present," said Tannenbaum. "When Brooke was chanting her portion, you could hear a pin drop. The room was that quiet."

Martyn said a signing interpreter helped guests who were also hard of hearing to understand the ceremony, which allowed Brooke's milestone to be enjoyed by all.

A luncheon followed the Saturday morning service, and the family held a Sunday night party at the Richmond Hill Country Club.

Now that her bat mitzvah has passed, Brooke said, "I feel very relieved that I don't have to practise any more."

She has since turned her attention to completing Grade 7 at York Hill Elementary School.

Martyn said a special teacher assists her in the classroom for up to six hours a week. Her marks are in the 80s.

In her spare time, Brooke enjoys arts and crafts, reading Harry Potter novels and listening to her new Avril Lavigne CD. She has also taken part in ballet, swimming, jazz, hip hop, karate and softball.

Grade 2 student sells frozen treats for Third World

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

During afternoon recess on Tuesdays and Thursdays, Andrew Shinoff can be found surrounded by a frenzied crowd of impatient students waiting to buy frozen juice pops from him.

Andrew, a Grade 2 student at Forest Hill Public School, started selling the treats last year in Grade 1, when his teacher assigned a project in which students had to help people, animals or the environment.

"I chose to help people, and I chose to help Third World countries," Andrew said.

Andrew's mother Mindy Shinoff, a registered nurse, suggested he raise money for Interplast, a nonprofit organization that provides free reconstructive surgery to needy children and adults in developing countries.

Originally, Andrew wanted to sell lemonade, but after telling his mother they would have to start by buying wood to build a stand, she suggested selling something frozen instead.

"That way we just needed a cooler, which we didn't have to build," Shinoff laughed.

Andrew started pitching his wares on weekends at a nearby park, until the family got the idea to have him sell them at school during recess.

After raising almost $600 last year, Andrew decided to raise money for Interplast every year.

"He got such phenomenal acknowledgement from Interplast," said Shinoff. "They sent him letters and stories about the types of children he's helped."

Andrew has written for the school newsletter and made announcements over the PA system to let fellow students know how much money he is raising.

Andrew Shinoff

Shinoff said Andrew's goal is to raise at least $500 for Interplast each year.

"This year, we've been doing pretty well," he said. "Even though we started just in June, we've raised over $100 so far."

Andrew said the job isn't easy.

"Everyone doesn't line up, they just crowd all around, and we have to do it really fast because recess is only 15 minutes and there's like 50 people!" he said.

Shinoff said Andrew's nanny usually helps him.

"It's very difficult for one person to do by themselves, whether you're seven years old or 27 years old," she said. "It gets pretty crowded, pretty fast."

Shinoff described the scene as "100 kids in a crowd all fighting over the last blue one."

Andrew sells each treat for 75 cents.

"We contribute the freezies, and everything he sells goes to Interplast," Shinoff said.

Andrew said he doesn't mind missing his recess.

"I would rather help other countries than [have my] recess," he said. "We don't want other countries to be really really poor and to be hurt."

Shinoff said Andrew has always been concerned about helping others.

"It's in his nature," she explained.

Andrew's grandfather, Murray Rich, agreed.

"He's a delightful kid and a good boy," Rich said. "I'm pretty proud of him."

Andrew will continue to sell the treats until the end of the school year.

"When school's over, he'll probably [sell them in the park] until he goes to camp, just to make his goal of $500," Shinoff said. "If he passes it, that's a bonus."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Photo artist May Karp has donated 27 original framed images to the new surgical waiting room at the Toronto General Hospital.

"I hope my gift will add serenity and peace of mind to people who are in an otherwise stressful situation," Karp says. "I have carefully selected these images to reflect the multicultural aspect of Toronto – the people who use this room."

Most of us, she says, will spend time in a hospital, as a patient or as a visitor. "Hospitals can sometimes feel like impersonal places. While busy doctors and staff go about their important work at a demanding pace, many patients and their loved ones endure difficult and potentially life-altering scenarios.

I "spent long hours in waiting rooms during my late mother's bout with breast cancer, There were many times that the anxiety and stress took their toll. That's when I began thinking of a way to improve the experience of others."

Karp formerly worked as a library technician, but when her father retired, she bought and operated his automotive fabric and vinyl business. Ten years ago, she herself retired to travel with her husband, Fred Karp.

She was always interested in many different creative art forms, including painting, batik making and print making. When she retired from business, she decided to pursue her lifelong love of photography, and she always carried a camera with her.

She got positive feedback and encouragement from Sorel Etrog and other photographers, and she began working on her photography in earnest.

Karp has previously donated her photographs to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Mount Sinai Hospital and Princess Margaret Hospital. To date, she has donated more than 100 pieces.

She has had three one-woman shows at the Moore Gallery in Toronto, and her eclectic photographs can be found in corporate offices and private collections throughout North America and Europe, and she has participated in many fundraising events.

The photographs donated to Toronto General were taken in diverse locales. Karp sometimes uses the Sabbatier effect, in which a developing image is exposed to white light during the development process, giving the effect of a partial reversal of the image. She also uses other techniques that she says she has developed herself.

"These transform some of my photos into abstract and painterly images," she says.

"We are thrilled to have May's collection," says Dr. Tyrone David, head of cardiovascular surgery at the United Health Network. "Gifts of this nature benefit everyone. They have a positive and profound effect on families, visitors and volunteers alike."

Wiesenthal 'spoke for those who could not speak for themselves'

In The Sunflower, Wiesenthal described how the Jews of a town were herded into a building and how SS units set fire to it. Those trying to flee by jumping out of windows were shot.

While a prisoner at a concentration camp, Wiesenthal learned of the incident from a dying SS man who had participated in the atrocity and wanted a Jew, any Jew, to forgive him. Wiesenthal was summoned to the camp's medical facility, where the young officer, named Karl, told him the story and asked to be forgiven. Wiesenthal remained silent. He is still troubled by the incident and has asked many theologians and thinkers what they would have done in his place.

The school's dance interpretation of the moral dilemma was one of the many highlights of a program that honoured Wiesenthal's 60-year effort to preserve the memory of Nazism's victims by bringing their killers to justice.

Rabbi Meyer May, executive director of the centre's Los Angeles office, said Wiesenthal "spoke for those who could not speak for themselves, for children not able to be adults and for parents not able to become grandparents."

He noted that despite the hope after the Holocaust that such events could never happen again, "Cambodia, Rwanda, Kosovo happened. Today, the threat of international terrorism hangs over us."

As part of its mission to teach mutual respect and tolerance, the Wiesenthal Center is planning to establish a "Center for Human Dignity; Museum of Tolerance" in Jerusalem.

The evening's program, which raised $650,000 for the centre's Canadian operations, was hosted by CBC personality Evan Solomon.

Israel's chief Sephardi rabbi visits Canada that some rabbis and religious council employees have suffered a complete loss of remuneration. On a positive note, he said the unpaid workers likely generated goodwill by not going on strike, even though it had been suggested to them as their only option.

Rabbi Amar is optimistic that the situation will improve, because there has been a staffing change in the office of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

A native of Morocco who made aliyah as a young teenager, Rabbi Amar served as a rabbinic court judge from 1982 until 2002, when he was unanimously acclaimed chief rabbi of Tel Aviv – a "miraculous" accomplishment, noted Rabbi Assayag in his introduction, alluding to the rarity of consensus among Israelis.

In the year since Rabbi Amar was appointed to his current position, he has met with Pope John Paul II in Rome, and with King Mohammed VI of Morocco, among his other duties.

Referring in part to his meeting with the Pope, whom he visited in January along with Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger to discuss Catholic-Jewish relations, Rabbi Amar noted that he has worked more with Christian counterparts than with Muslims. However, he noted, he has had contact with Muslim clerics from outside of Israel and also with a local Palestinian sheik who "claims he wants to work towards peace," an idea Rabbi Amar described as "still on a slow burner."

"We're always happy to have an opportunity for interchange," he said. "We believe that when [Muslim leaders] gain courage to come forward and speak, that will bring peace closer."

Rabbi Amar's meeting with Mohammed VI last July led to a meeting in Morocco of Moroccan-born rabbis, at the initiative of the rabbi. A planned meeting between rabbis and Muslim clerics was cancelled, but Rabbi Amar expects it will be rescheduled later this year.

Despite socio-economic gaps and wide variations in religious observance among Jews in Israel, Rabbi Amar believes the population is united by a desire for a "Jewish vision" for the country.

He believes that, even more than security issues, class differences and extremism on the part of some elements in both the secular and religious communities constitute the most serious problems facing the Jewish community in Israel.

Rabbi Amar feels that part of his mission is to bridge the gap, he said. "We're all Jews. We all believe in the same religion. Some are more observant, some are less observant."

Referring to recent news that former chief Sephardi rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron advocated putting an end to the rabbinate's monopoly on performing marriages in Israel, Rabbi Amar said he has great respect for his predecessor, but could not explain how he came to that conclusion.

In his talk, Rabbi Amar urged listeners to study Torah, which he described as the Jewish nation's source of stability and "the only thing that will bring the final redemption."

Following his visit to Toronto, the rabbi went to Montreal to take part in the Quinzaine Sépharade de Montréal, a major Sephardi cultural event.

Knife-wielding restaurateur threatens Kashruth Council staff

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A knife-wielding restaurant owner will face a variety of assault and weapons charges after he threatened staff at the Kashruth Council in the Lipa Green Building last Friday.

Police were called to the Kashruth Council's second-floor offices after a man brandished a large kitchen knife and expressed anger at his difficulties in receiving kosher certification for his business, said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, which is also located in the Lipa Green Building.

By the time police arrived, Kashruth Council staff had wrested the knife away and building security had been called, Rudner said.

Det. Mike Stones of 32 Division said the individual would be charged and held overnight pending a bail hearing. He said the incident involved "a dispute over licensing" and that the only person hurt was the accused, who was cut for two stitches in his hand when he tried to take the knife back.

Stones would not release the name of the individual until he had been formally charged.

Rudner said the individual was familiar to the building's security staff and was not prevented from entering the facility. "There was no reason to suspect him," he said.

Rudner said Congress officials could not recall a similar incident at the Bathurst Street community building. "Whenever an occurrence like this takes place, it presents an opportunity to evaluate security measures," he added.

Hitting the streets for One Hot Day

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

For Ben Mogil, being a Jew is about giving back.

And he sees no better way to do that than by rolling up his sleeves and getting right down to the business of helping others through One Hot Day, a program run by the volunteers of Hands on Toronto, an initiative of UJA Federation's Young Adult Division (YAD).

One Hot Day, now in its fifth year, will be held Sunday, June 27. Young Jewish people from across Toronto will participate in 10 hands-on projects throughout the GTA that will give them a chance to make a tangible difference in the lives of those in need.

"Tikun Olam (repairing the world) is one of the basic tenets of Judaism, and that's why it's so important for us to go out in the community and help others in need," said Mogil, who is chairing One Hot Day with Sharlene Milgram.

At least 100 young people are expected to take part in at least one of the projects around the city, which include helping out with gardening and outdoor clean-up at the Kehilla Centre; at downtown youth shelters or on the Oak Ridges Moraine; spending time with adults and children with developmental disabilities at Reena; giving the elderly spa treatments at a local retirement home; making sandwiches for the homeless; packing food at the Second Harvest Food Bank; helping a newly arrived family get settled in their homes; and new this year, helping out at the Wildlife Centre through cleaning and making repairs. Following the projects, participants will celebrate their success at a Bathurst Jewish Community Centre barbecue.

"Everyone has an obligation to give back, and this is a great way to get involved in a meaningful project where participants will see tangible results by the end of the day," Mogil noted. "Everyone walks away feeling good."

"This is a great opportunity for young people to help others in need, while having fun at the same time," added Milgram. "Being a part of this program makes me proud to be Jewish," she said.

Mogil noted that One Hot Day is a great way for people to introduce their friends to new ways to volunteer. "Often people bring their friends with them – the more the better," he said.

Jennifer Verschraegen, Coordinator of Volunteers and Development at Second Harvest Food Bank, said her organization is always excited when UJA Federation volunteers walk through the door.

"Every time they come out, they're providing at least 15,000 pounds of food to our agencies, so that much more food can get to the front lines of hunger. It really makes a difference," she said.

Verschraegen noted how impressed she has always been by these young volunteers. "Whenever we get a group through UJA Federation, they're always extremely happy to be here, and they are extremely productive. The level of involvement they give is really outstanding."

Members of UJA Federation's One Hot Day program pitched in last summer, helping to clean a garden at toronto's Anshei Minsk synagogue. Those with the green thumbs are: (l-r) Marni Banack, Eli Mogil, Ben Mogil and Robyn Kaiser.

Former emissary from Israel returns to build bridges in informal education

Natan Kandler just can't seem to get enough of Toronto.

Natan Kandler

The former shaliach (emissary from Israel) to Toronto, who served as the student activities coordinator at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto from 1996 to 2000, is coming back to the city for another posting starting in August. This time he'll be working at UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education as head of the educational delegation to Canada, replacing Channa Pinchasi, who will be returning to Israel after serving in Toronto for three years.

Kandler, who was born in London and made aliyah with his family at the age of four, is an informal educator with a Master's degree in education and a rabbinical ordination. Prior to his first stint in Toronto, he founded a program in schools across Israel offering seminars and lectures on Judaism. Since his departure from Toronto in 2000, Kandler has been the director of youth activities for the Shomron Regional Council.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, Vice President of Education for UJA Federation, cites Kandler's great success both in the classroom and in informal education for the decision to bring him back to Toronto.

"What impressed us most was that, while he represents the very best of Israeli educators, he also has a very positive feeling about Diaspora Jewish youth, and he sees himself very much as a community educator with pluralist values. He manages to demonstrate deep respect for all the various movements in contemporary Jewish life," he said.

"Natan was able to relate very professionally to his colleagues, but at the same time, students instinctively felt he was someone who understood young people - he could get them involved," added Paul Shaviv, CHAT's Director of Education, who worked with Kandler during his last posting in Toronto.

"This is a great opportunity for me to build another significant bridge between Israel and the Jews in Toronto," Kandler said of his return. "The relationship between the Diaspora and Israel is one of the most important issues to explore, and I think I have something important to contribute to this relationship."

Kandler cites several goals for his two-to-three-year stay in Toronto.

"I would like to have an impact on the informal education structure in the city by getting involved with youth movements and Jewish camps. I would also like to really bring Toronto's Jewish community to Israel, and bring Israel to Toronto," he said.

That shouldn't be hard for a man who was loved by his students and respected by his colleagues.

"I felt embraced by Toronto when I was here in 1996. I look forward to reconnecting with all of my friends and former students upon my return," he added.

The changing face of Jewish Toronto

Report cites shifts in population

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

While Horace Greeley once urged, "go west, young man," it's Jewish Toronto's northern and southern fringes that continue to see unprecedented growth today, while some more traditional neighbourhoods, once synonymous with Jewish Toronto, are experiencing just the opposite.

These are just some of the findings from a recent report, published by UJA Federation. The report, based on data collected from the 2001 census, was written by Charles Shahar - chief researcher, national demographic study on the Jewish population of Canada.

Not surprisingly, Toronto Jewry - which currently stands at 180,000 - continues to "go the way of the cottage", migrating north to York Region, where the Jewish population increased from roughly 1,500 in 1971 to almost 60,000 in 2001.

"I've lived in Vaughan my entire life," says Debby Starr, a 44-year-old Richmond Hill mother of four. "I grew up in Thornhill and I've always felt very comfortable here. I'm very excited about the new Jewish community project in Vaughan that should be up and running in a few years too. So are my kids."

While the majority of Jewish York Region residents live in Vaughan, Thornhill, Richmond Hill or Markham, the ongoing northerly trend has spread even further to Aurora and Newmarket. In the last ten years, Aurora's Jewish community has grown by almost 800 individuals, while Newmarket Jewry has grown by an impressive 81 percent, or 330 new Jewish residents.

Meanwhile, Toronto's Jews are moving south as well at an impressive clip into the city core. At least 21,000 Jews now live south of St. Clair Avenue.

"This increase is similar to the gains experienced in the previous two decades," says Shahar. "In short, there is a continuing momentum for population growth in the downtown Jewish community."

For example, the youthful Beaches district - a place known more for its cafes, frozen yogurt, and roller-blading than it's Jewish content - has quietly, yet steadily, become more attractive for Jewish residents over the past three decades.

The Jewish population of the Beaches and the Danforth area, also known as Toronto's 'Greektown' for its distinctive architecture and prominent restaurants, has more than doubled in that time. It is among the fastest growing Jewish populations in Toronto.

At the other end of that spectrum is Bathurst Manor, known simply as "the Manor" by Jewish Torontonians, where the Jewish population has declined by 36 percent over the last two decades, after peaking in 1981.

"My best guess is that some of the elderly residents in these areas have been dying in the last 20 years and younger families have not necessarily been moving there to replenish it, so the population started to decline," says Shahar.

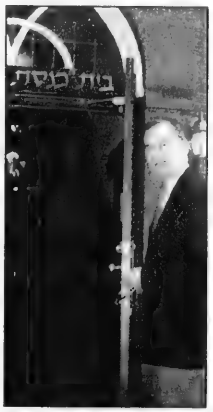
One resident of the Manor with no plans to leave is Norma Richmond, who, after arriving from Montreal 17 years ago, made the area her home.

"Growing up in England, I really didn't have much chance to participate in Jewish life," she says. "I truly enjoy living in a real Jewish area today. I especially love the fact that, while I'm so close to downtown, I have parks and open spaces here that I absolutely love."

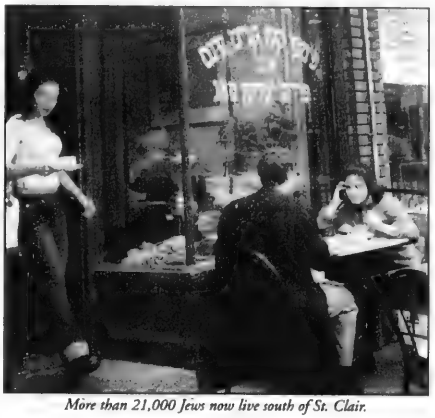
The report also showed a small decrease of 4,000 in the last decade for the central Jewish community between St.Clair and Steeles Avenue.

"The 1981 Census marked the peak year for the Jewish population here, with a total of almost 100,000 individuals," says Shahar. "In fact, there were 4 times as many Jews here then as the downtown and northern regions combined."

But some central Jewish neighbourhoods have enjoyed significant increases. For example, the Jewish population of the Lawrence and Wilson district has not only grown by 28 percent, it's also among the fastest growing Jewish neighbourhoods in Toronto.



Arie Nerman, President of the Beach Hebrew Institute and a member of the shul for more than 30 years.



More than 21,000 Jews now live south of St. Clair.

Bathurst Street remains the hub of Jewish life in Toronto as seen here during UJA Federation's 2003 Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration.

Off the beaten track!

A growing Jewish population in Aurora? What about up in Newmarket? Steady Jewish growth in Oakville? Twenty years ago it may have seemed like science fiction, but today, it's reality.

The number of Jews living in Aurora has been increasing steadily as the migration north continues. In the last 10 years, the Aurora Jewish community has grown by close to 800 individuals.

Newmarket's Jewish presence is 81 percent larger than it was in 1991.

Between 1991 and 2001, the Jewish community of Oakville experienced a significant gain with an increase of 67 percent, or 515 individuals. Oakville's Jewish population has been growing since 1971, but the gain of the last decade has been the most noteworthy.

Jews continue to migrate to outlying areas of the GTA.

Portrait of our community

- Over two-thirds of Jews living in the Greater Toronto area reside along the Bathurst Street corridor, between Dufferin and Yonge.
- The Jewish population of York Region increased from 1,500 in 1971 to almost 60,000 in 2001.
- Toronto's downtown Jewish population continues to flourish today. Currently, there are more than 21,000 Jews living south of St. Clair Avenue.
- The neighbourhood with the highest density of Jewish elderly is Bathurst Manor. More than a third (38.6 per cent) of Jews in "the Manor" are senior citizens.
- Richmond Hill's Jewish community is the youngest in the GTA with a median age of 32.5 years.
- The Jewish populations of Caledon, Orangeville, King, Milton and Halton Hills are rather small but they have been increasing in the last decade.
- The Annex / Bloor West / Yorkville Jewish population has been steadily rising over the last three decades.
- The Jewish population of the High Park and Junction districts has been increasing in the last three decades.
- Markham has by far the largest percentage of Jewish teens and young adults between the ages of 15 and 24. They represent the children of middle-aged adults, who dominate the age distribution of Markham Jews. The lowest proportion of Jews 14-24 is found east of Bathurst on Finch and Steeles.

Tory hopes for 'quantum shift' in Jewish vote

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In politics, name recognition can go a long way and Ken Dryden, a former Stanley Cup-winning goaltender for the Montreal Canadiens who is now president of the Toronto Maple Leafs, has it in spades.

York Centre

One of the Liberal Party's star candidates, plunked by the party into the York Centre riding vacated by former defence minister Art Eggleton, he is facing a spirited campaign from Conservative Michael Mostyn and New Democrat Peter Flaherty.

Despite their opponent's high profile and the fact the riding has been held by the Liberals since the 1960s, both Mostyn and Flaherty believe Dryden – or any Liberal for that matter – is vulnerable given the widespread revulsion at the government's sponsorship scandal and the spillover from Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's broken promises.

Mostyn, a 30-year-old lawyer, is clearly on the offensive, attempting to turn Dryden's star power against him, arguing that he, unlike the Hockey Hall of Famer, actually resides in the riding and has "deep connectedness in the community." As for Dryden's storied hockey career, Mostyn points out that while his opponent played in the NHL, he plays at Chesswood Arena, smack in the middle of the riding.

The riding is 25 per cent Jewish, with sizeable Italian and Hispanic communities as well. It is bounded by Highway 401 to the south, Jane Street and Keele Street to the west and the west branch of the Don River on the east. Since the 2000 election, York Centre has acquired a slice of the Willowdale riding south of Steeles Avenue up to Finch Avenue, running from Bathurst to Yonge streets.

"It's disrespectful of the Liberals to parachute in a candidate," Mostyn argues.

People in the area want change and they want local people to deliver it, he says. They want the "mess" at Downsview Park cleaned up without parts of it sold off, and they back the Tories' tough law and order platform, he says.

Flaherty, a retired teacher and longstanding NDP campaign worker, says he has found "strong disillusionment with the Liberal government" among voters, who are demanding accountability and integrity. He is pushing the NDP's perspective on "the green economy – that you can have clean environment and create jobs" – as well as the party's claim it is "the most likely to stand for a not-for-profit health system."

Flaherty, who was parachuted into York Centre after the riding association could not field a local candidate, castigates the Liberals for breaking their promise to turn Downsview into a park.

For his part, Dryden acknowledges that in campaigning, he is finding no shortage of people eager to "vent. But people's entire feelings aren't captured in a vent, so what else is beneath it?"

He responds to their anger by telling them that "the last 10 years have been good, haven't they?"

Unemployment and interest rates are down and the deficit has been eliminated. After pointing that out, "people agree," he says.

Dryden, not known for the 10-second sound bite, gives as good as he gets when questioning his opponents' qualifications.

"Ask the other candidates, 'Where else have you been? What are your experiences? What has tested you?'"

Although he doesn't live in the riding, Dryden says "if you grow up in Toronto, you have a significant understanding of North York as well as York Centre. It's not a little pocket where the experience is different than elsewhere."

> Riding was held by former defence minister Art Eggleton

Dryden says while researching a book on education, he witnessed firsthand the multicultural face of Toronto schools. Voters should ask themselves "which party best understands that part of Canada?" The Tories, he says, "are less comfortable with that reality of Canada and less excited by it, more ambivalent about it, less proud of it."

Although Eggleton won the riding in 2000 by 20,000 votes, Mostyn is convinced that Jews, who traditionally back the Grits in large numbers, are ready to change their votes.

"There's a quantum shift happening in the Jewish community," he asserts. "Jews feel betrayed" by the government's record on Israel.

"[Foreign Minister] Bill Graham met with [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat when he was isolated by the whole world," Mostyn notes.

As well, Liberal MP Tony Valeri met with Hezbollah representatives after that organization was declared a terrorist group, and as for MP Carolyn Parrish, just check her website, he says.

Stockwell Day, who could be named foreign minister in a Conservative government, "is a friend of Israel due to its democratic nature," says Mostyn, who attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is a member of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and is active with Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa.

Flaherty says he has canvassed Jewish neighbourhoods, but only one person mentioned disappointment with the NDP's policy on Israel. He acknowledges that some voters feel the NDP is too critical of Israel, but that criticism is limited to specific "policies in handling the current crisis." That does not include criticism of Israel as a state within secure borders, he says.

Flaherty, 56, agrees that "there is an absence of a negotiating partner for Israel. Arafat is corrupt and he prevents the emergence of an alternative leadership."

As for Israel's security barrier, Flaherty says, "I have a problem with any wall, but as a least bad solution, it might be necessary.

"I know it's a lot to ask Israel to show restraint when its citizens are being massacred," he adds.

Dryden says the Liberal Party is "not neutral on Israel at all… I think what all of us know deep down is the importance of Israel, the need for there to be a place that is safe, secure and sustainable."

Canada has negotiated a free trade agreement with Israel, and as for the support of UN resolutions critical of the Jewish state, Dryden says, "I know it's an irritant… I know sensitivities are there for a reason. We must be more aware of the irritation that comes with those votes, that the resolutions may be of no formal sanction, but they have some significant psychological effect on people… We have to be more sensitive to that."

Canada should judge each UN resolution on its merit: Martin

CJN: Do you believe there should be a greater emphasis on persuading Palestinians to end terror as a prerequisite to peace negotiations, and what role do you see Canada's playing in that regard?

Martin: I certainly think there should be huge effort to dissuade terrorism in Palestine and obviously anywhere, but certainly in Palestine. I continue to support the Road Map [peace plan] and I would really hope that while there are many bumps along the way, that one can bring that about. Do I think there should be a huge effort to dissuade Palestinians from terrorism? The answer is unequivocally "yes."

CJN: And a public role for Canada?

Martin: I think we all understand the role the United States plays, and that it has the prime role. I've certainly discussed with both Israelis and Palestinians that Canada would be prepared to play whatever role we possibly could in helping to bring about peace. In fact, I had discussions with the Israelis not long ago on this very issue and said, "Listen, we are prepared to do whatever is required of us."

CJN: Another major concern to members of our community has been Canada's voting record on Israel at the United Nations.

'I think the Road Map is right now the best chance we have'

Martin: Let me just say that I've spoken on that. I understand that. I've made it very clear… that we should judge every single instance on its merits. This idea that neutrality can lead to an evening out, I don't buy. I think every individual instance should be judged on its merit.

CJN: But do you think Canada should take a more principled stand on all anti-Israel resolutions at the UN?

Martin: I think Canada should judge each resolution on its merit. I think we understand, at times, the dynamic of the United Nations. I think we should be prepared to say, whether it be the United Nations or whether it be what happened at the [2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa], that this is not the way we are going to achieve peace and that certainly would not reflect my views. I just go back to it: The legitimacy of the Jewish State of Israel is an essential part of my concept of what our policy should be toward Israel. And it really all flows from that.

CJN: In commenting on Israel's assassination of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, you said Israelis "have every right and responsibility to protect themselves," yet you asked whether the move was "conducive to the peace process." Do you see a contradiction there?

Martin: Not at all. I made it very clear that Israel has the right to defend itself. But the question of whether [the assassination] was conducive [to peace] is one that many people have raised. And I didn't answer it, by the way. I simple raised the issue as have many others, including the United States.

Ultimately, the goal has got to be the safety and security of the people living in the region. And that means the Road Map to Peace. But Israel's right to defend itself is an absolute given.

CJN: In 1990, when you were running for the Liberal leadership, you said you supported a land-for-peace formula. Do you think that's out of date?

Martin: I think the Road Map, despite problems, is right now the best chance we have. I think the security of Israel's borders is the pre-eminent concern.

CJN: What will your party do to combat anti-Semitism in Canada and internationally and ensure the protection of Jewish and other vulnerable communities?

Martin: I spoke out immediately after the bombing of [United Talmud Torahs] school in Montreal. And I will speak out against every instance of that kind. I've met with many Jewish leaders in the country [and] I think everybody agrees that the real answer lies in education and it has to lie in education at the earliest years. When I was minister of finance, I set aside [money] to fund that kind of [anti-racist] education [program]. I'm disappointed that the take-up on it hasn't been nearly as strong as it should be. But I believe that we've simply got to make it so clear how unacceptable it is to engage in anti-Semitism or any other form of racism in this country.

Internationally, I believe we should be consistently speaking out against it, which I have in Europe. I also engaged in bilateral [relations] with a number of the G8 leaders on the issue. I believe we should be, as the G8, speaking with one voice, and that one voice is to not tolerate racism of any kind. And I've got to say, I've been pretty outspoken on this issue. I think Irwin Cotler – and I'm the one who made him minister of justice – has been a tremendous voice for Canada.

CJN: In 1999, the UN censured Canada with respect to Ontario's policy on funding Catholic schools but not other faith-based schools. How would your government correct the discrimination in Ontario?

Martin: Well, that's a provincial matter. One thing that I have learned as a federal politician, you comment on provincial jurisdiction at your peril.

CJN: I ask because it was Canada that was named.

Martin: Yes, I understand.

CJN: The Liberals are going into this election with seven consecutive balanced budgets and the strongest economy in the G8, yet are behind in the polls. How do you explain that?

Martin: First of all, based on the most recent polls, we're neck and neck [with the Conservatives]. I think the economy should be much more front-and-centre than it is. I think we've provided excellent management of the economy and the results are seen in the 100,000 jobs created over the last two months, low inflation and strong confidence in the business community. But there have been examples of waste in government and they've upset people, and they've upset me. That's why I brought in a whole series of measures to deal with them. I think that we've just got to make it very clear to people that we understand that you treat taxpayers' dollars as if they were your own. I think we could have a better job in that area. We're going to do a heck of a lot better job going ahead.

'Our support internationally for Israel cannot flinch'

CJN: Do you have a parting message for Canada's Jewish community?

Martin: Well, I've been very close to Canada's Jewish community, as was my father before me. I think we all understand the evolution of anti-Semitism, that we are all very concerned about it. I believe that the answer is that political leaders in this country have got to speak out forcefully on the issue whenever the occasion presents itself. I believe that our education system has to take into account the need to deal with it. And I believe that our support internationally for Israel cannot flinch. We have always supported the legitimacy and security of the Jewish state. And we must continue to do so.

Swastikas found on Conservative election signs

By RON STANG
Special to the CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. – In the second such local incident during the federal election campaign, the Conservative candidate for Windsor West, Jordan Katz, had nine of his election lawn signs defaced with spray-painted swastikas.

Windsor West

Katz, who is Jewish, has decided to leave the signs on the lawns in the south Windsor neighbourhood where they were disovered last week. He has placed a small Canadian flag, as well as a new election sign, beside each one, in order to "demonstrate that Canadians won't stand for this sort of thing."

He said the idea to leave the defaced signs was proposed by the owners of the properties they were found on.

"I would prefer that the signs be left up to demonstrate to everyone that we must always be vigilant against this sort of thing. It's not something that we can ever pretend is going away, ever pretend isn't an issue."

Windsor police are investigating the incidents as a hate crime.

Bernie Farber, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said that regardless of whether Katz was targeted as a Jew or a Conservative, "the idea of any Canadian comparing any Canadian political party with the Nazis is outrageous."

Katz, a former manager in the casino industry who is running in his first election, said he wasn't entirely surprised by the vandalism.

"I was expecting some sort of public reaction because I'm Jewish." Yet, he added, "you're always surprised when you're faced with this type of hatred and intolerance."

Earlier in the campaign, Rick Fuschi, the Conservative candidate in the neighbouring riding of Windsor-Tecumseh, who is not Jewish, also had about 50 signs defaced.

"There were a variety of creative things on them, but many of them had swastikas," Fuschi told The CJN.

Fuschi also left some of the larger defaced signs up for a couple of days, "just so people could have a look and be aware that it was happening." Police are also investigating, but suspect the vandalism is not hate-inspired. Fuschi, who is running a second time for federal office after losing a 2002 by-election, said the event "did startle me. I wasn't expecting anything of this kind."

Katz received support in his own riding from Liberal candidate Richard Pollock, a federal prosecutor, and incumbent NDP MP Brian Masse, who applauded him for publicizing the issue.

But some callers to a radio talk show suggested Katz was keeping the signs up for political gain. A couple of callers also suggested there were no sinister motives behind the vandalism, just youthful pranksters.

Fuschi said he does not believe the social climate in Windsor has become more intolerant. "The only thing that has changed in Windsor from this election to the last is that the Conservatives are actually in a run for the money," and could be "a threat" to other parties.

The Conservatives are leading handily in an adjacent riding, Essex, home of incumbent Liberal and former cabinet minister Susan Whelan, and Fuschi himself is running neck-and-neck with NDP incumbent Joe Comartin in Windsor-Tecumseh, according to the latest Windsor Star poll.

Last month, vandals spray-painted signs on the campaign signs of Liberal house leader Jacques Saada, a Tunisian-born Jew running in the Montreal-area riding of Brossard-La Prairie.

Jewish MP optimistic about re-election in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Liberal Anita Neville, MP for Winnipeg South Centre, is cautiously optimistic about her chances of recapturing the seat she won for the first time in the 2000 federal election.

"We are just getting rolling," she said when contacted a day after Prime Minister Paul Martin called the election for June 28. "I am always concerned at the beginning of a campaign. You never know what issues will come up. I hope to receive strong support from my Jewish constituents."

Winnipeg South Centre

Neville, the only Jewish candidate running for one of the three major parties in Manitoba, represents the Winnipeg riding with the largest Jewish population. Between 60 and 70 per cent of Winnipeg's Jews live in the affluent riding, which has 55,000 voters out of a total population of almost 78,000.

Neville served for many years as a school trustee for Winnipeg School Division No. 1 before winning the seat previously held by former foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy.

She says she worked hard on a number of issues of concern to the Jewish community during her first term.

"I co-chaired Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, along with Art Eggleton," she notes. "I also advocated within caucus on concerns the Jewish community had on our relations with Israel, as well as local Jewish concerns."

Neville notes she is also greatly involved in the Jewish community's Grow Winnipeg campaign, which aims to increase the size of the city's Jewish population to 18,000 by 2010. (The Jewish population, estimated at between 14,000 and 15,000, has been augmented in the past couple of years by about 600 new arrivals from Argentina, Israel and the former Soviet Union. In addition to immigration, Grow Winnipeg is also working to attract back former Winnipeggers who have moved elsewhere and to persuade young people to stay.)

Neville's Conservative opponent, Raj Joshi, is equally confident about his prospects. "We think this riding is winnable," he says. "Realignment has brought in some areas with a significant number of Conservative voters."

Although this is his first run for office, Joshi had worked for the former Progressive Conservative Party for a number of years and was president of the PCs at McGill University in the mid-1990s. At the time, he was also actively involved on the "No" side in the Quebec referendum in 1995.

Joshi has a bachelor of engineering from McGill and an MBA from Oxford University. He worked in Melbourne, Australia, and Afghanistan before returning to Winnipeg last year.

Joshi says he stands firmly behind Israel and strongly opposes terrorism noting that his family's homeland, India, also confronts terrorism. He also says he doesn't support the right of the Palestinians to return to what is now Israel.

But, he adds, "I believe in basic human rights," saying, "I think good fences can make for good neighbours. I know most Jews and Israelis feel for the plight of the Palestinians."

Referring to the lenient sentences handed out to the young adults who vandalized the Hebrew Sick Cemetery here five years ago, he is also calling for stronger sentences in hate crime cases to send a real message.

NDP candidate James Allum is running for the second time in the riding. He received 20 per cent of the vote in 2000.

"We did very well last time, and we are building on that momentum," he says. "People have an appetite for change and they know me from the last campaign."

Allum is the City of Winnipeg's Environmental co-ordinator. He also teaches part-time at the University of Winnipeg and chairs the Manitoba Heritage Council.

On the subject of the Middle East, he describes the Arab-Israeli conflict as complex. "I would like to find some way for the Israelis and the Palestinians to live in peace with each other," he says. "Canada has a great tradition of promoting peace and prosperity."

A Paul Martin Government believes that our publicly funded health care system is the number one priority.

We will:

- Work with the professions to address licensing issues, starting with licensing 1,000 foreign-trained physicians across the country.
- Invest $1 billion to support public health to create a new Canada Public Health Agency to focus on addressing such diseases as SARS and West Nile.
- Create a national waiting times strategy to ensure the type of care you need, when you need it.

This is the Canada that we want.
We hope you'll choose it too.

A myth that must be laid to rest

In an interview with Jordan's King Abdullah on June 14, NBC news anchor Tom Brokaw raised the subject of growing anti-Americanism in the Arab world. Abdullah said that only when the "core issue" of the Middle East is solved can other problems be addressed. And what for him is the core issue? The Israeli-Palestinian conflict, of course.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Brokaw then asked: "Can the United States ever get back to a favourable position as long as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict continues at the level it is now?"

Abdullah's answer was breathtaking: "No. And none of us have any hope for a true future in the Middle East, or the rest of the world for that matter, if we don't solve this critical core issue of the Middle East." (emphasis added) Brokaw followed up by meekly asking Abdullah about Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's responsibility for the ongoing conflict and about why there isn't more condemnation of suicide bombers by him and other Arab leaders.

What Brokaw failed to question is the underlying assumption espoused as a mantra by virtually all Arab leaders: that solving their internal problems – repressiveness, economic backwardness and often corrupt regimes – depends on a resolution to a conflict that they themselves have spent decades fuelling precisely because they always had a good excuse for not looking their own failures directly in the eye.

To hear Abdullah (who, after all, has a peace agreement with Israel) proclaim that solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the key to the future of the world, not only to the Middle East – and to see this go unchallenged by Brokaw – reveals the sad state of thinking that prevails in so much of the world.

That the fate of nearly seven billion people rests on the actions of some five million Jews occupying an infinitesimal fraction of the earth is a stunning, absurd idea that needs to be laid to rest once and for all.

The Globe and Mail editorial, "Why delay reforms in the Arab world?" (June 10) took a stab at doing precisely that. It deflated the reigning myth prevalent not only in the Arab/Muslim world, but in much of the West, too – that solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a precondition for achieving reform in Arab states.

The Globe argues that while a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute "would ease tensions in the Arab world," it would not solve them. In the meantime, "[t]here is no earthly reason why Arab leaders cannot carry out the reforms that their people so desperately need. For years they have been using Israel as an excuse for their own failures."

In the Brokaw interview, Abdullah also insisted that "if you want to deal with terrorism, you have to deal with the core issue in the Middle East, which is the Israeli/Palestinian one. That is the main recruiter for terrorism."

Again, the Globe had the right response: "It will not wash anymore. It is obvious to the whole world that the Arab world cries out for change. No other region suffers such a deficit of political and economic freedom. That deficit [not Israel] fuels terrorism, because it leaves no outlet for the energies and frustrations of its people, who are often condemned to unemployment and misery because their governments stifle opportunity."

The Globe has dealt a blow to the myth that, somehow, if the Arab-Israeli conflict ended, the Arab regimes would embrace democracy and freedom. Perhaps others in the mainstream media will also reject this longstanding Arab line, which has served only to scapegoat Israel and prevent much-needed change.

Prominent rabbi retires after 23 years in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When Rabbi Arnold Fine arrived in Ottawa 23 years ago with his wife, Charlene, and four children, he could not have imagined what lay ahead. As he prepares to retire, he paused to reflect.

"For a kid that never expected to leave Massachusetts, I've come a long way," said Rabbi Fine, spiritual leader of Congregation Agudath Israel, Ottawa's largest Conservative shul.

Rabbi Fine served as spiritual leader of city's largest Conservative synagogue

"I thought I would always be in Massachusetts and would always lead a small congregation. I ended up in Ottawa with a large congregation with all kinds of opportunities, and somehow or other it all worked."

Rabbi Fine has witnessed many changes to both the city itself and Congregation Agudath Israel during his nearly quarter-century tenure.

Ottawa has become "a great deal larger and more sophisticated," he said. As for the synagogue, "I didn't know who I was coming to, but I had a sense of who I was and what I wanted the congregation to be in the future… a congregation that would be open to one and all, a centre for the community, a place that would give people an opportunity to explore who we are in the Conservative movement."

The role of women in the congregation has expanded and is "a reflection of who we are and where we are going. It has been done very carefully and respectfully, and the process is ongoing," he said.

Rabbi Fine has made a name for himself beyond the Jewish community as well. Soon after he arrived in Ottawa, he began meeting with members of the Christian clergy and began a Christian-Jewish dialogue, which has grown and expanded to also include Muslims.

"I have made some very good friends," he said. "We have a very long way to go, but we are going to get there and that, I think, is the important thing."

A retirement dinner for Rabbi Fine was so over-sold that there was a long waiting list of people hoping for the chance to wish him and his family well.

His popularity throughout the city was evidenced by the people from other congregations, as well as other religions, who were anxious to attend and pay tribute to him.

Among those at the dinner in his honour were Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas and Rev. Tom Sherwood, a United Church minister.

As for the future, Rabbi Fine does not plan to be idle.

"Hopefully, I will find some other ways of serving… there is much to be done, and I don't want to stop," he said.

One thing is for certain: the Fines won't be leaving Ottawa, their adopted home.

"I don't have a lot of relatives here, but I have a lot of family. The community has been here for me during difficult situations of personal illness and loss. In many ways, they have been my rabbi as well," he said.

"Our home is here and will remain here and that won't change. This is where we will be, hopefully, forever."

Ottawa community honours three volunteers

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Three community volunteers were recognized for their efforts earlier this month at the 70th annual general meeting of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir.

The Freiman Family Young Leadership Award, established in 1988, recognizes a person under age 40 who has rendered exceptional service to the community. This year's recipient was Sarah Beutel who, since arriving from Montreal in 1991, has volunteered extensively, as she did in her hometown.

Beutel was given a similar honour in Montreal prior to her move. She has also been awarded the Lawrence Greenberg Young Leadership Award, established three years ago to enable the winner to attend the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities of North America.

Naomi Lipsky Cracower was the second annual winner of the Shem Tov Community Volunteer Award, which recognizes a volunteer who, through many years of service, has contributed to the enrichment of Jewish life in Ottawa. Lipsky Cracower has been actively involved in Ottawa Jewish communal work for 32 years, since arriving from Montreal. She has also been a supply teacher at Hillel Academy for 24 years, and will be retiring this month.

In presenting the award, Gerald Levitz, chair of the selection committee, said, "If you want some help in getting something done in the Ottawa Jewish community, you call Naomi."

The annual Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award, initiated in 1980, bears the name of the late past president of the Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir who exemplified the leadership qualities the award seeks to recognize. This year's award was presented by Robert and Roger Greenberg to Stephen Greenberg. "Steve possesses many of the qualities of the previous generation, and I know that many of those who came before us are looking down tonight with pride," Robert said.

At the June 2 AGM, held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, Vaad executive director Mitchell Bellman reviewed the community's achievements of the past year and praised volunteers and professional staff.

"We are the envy of many other religious and ethnic groups," he said. "We have developed a community that cares for one another, is compassionate, creative and generous."

Robert Greenberg, chair of the 2004 UJA campaign, was recognized for his efforts and it was announced he has agreed to serve a second term. Bonnie Merovitz, the 2004 chair of the UJA Women's Campaign, was also thanked for her two terms. She will be replaced for the 2005 campaign by Anna-Lee Chiprout and Suzanne Sassoon.

Disabled Israeli vets visit capital

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A casual observer may have thought they were just another group of tourists enjoying the sights in the nation's capital, but this group has a story of its own.

The 10 men, in Ottawa on a two-week visit to Canada spent mostly in Toronto, were guests of Beit Halochem, a rehabilitation organization that caters to disabled veterans from the Israeli army, police and border guards, as well as civilians injured in terrorist attacks. It has four rehab centres in Israel, with plans for a fifth, and most of its funding comes from Diaspora Jews.

The vacations to Canada began nearly 30 years ago, but the Ottawa portion of the trip was added 19 years ago, after Ruth Aaron, who had heard about the program, decided to bring the group to Canada's capital. She coordinates this leg of the trip with the assistance of a few other volunteers.

Participants are chosen according to various criteria, including degree of disability (as determined by Israel's Ministry of Defence). This year's group was as varied in age and background as in their disabilities, from kibbutzniks to city dwellers, young to not-so-young.

Mula Salah is a Druze man from the village of Yarka in the Galilee. As a member of the border police, he was shot four times while guarding Israeli settlers and protecting them from terrorists crossing the border. He and other Druze have allied themselves with Israel, often being criticized and called traitors by their Muslim neighbours.

Mekwanent Abate arrived in Israel from Ethiopia with Operation Solomon at the age of 16. He studied hotel management and worked as a concierge at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. While serving as a paramedic in the Israeli army, Abate was injured by an explosion in Gaza and has lost his hearing in one ear. With the decline in tourism, he has retrained and now works as a computer network technician.

Daniel Ben-Shabat, of Haifa, is studying economics at Haifa University. After serving in the army for 11 years, he was hit by a car while on reserve duty. He spent seven months in hospital, enduring several surgeries, and nearly three years of rehabilitation.

It took 30 years for Aharon Narkiss, from Kibbutz Naan, to be formally recognized as disabled when he was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress syndrome. His unit was ambushed in the Sinai during the Yom Kippur War and Narkiss spent 46 days in captivity. The memories are still with him.

While in Ottawa, the men enjoyed a swim at the Soloway JCC, and they toured Parliament Hill, the Museum of Civilization and took a boat ride on the Ottawa River.

The highlight for many of them was being warmly welcomed at the residence of Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon and his wife Linda.

It's time to demand better!

I began visiting homes throughout Thornhill many months ago and I was overwhelmed by the growing cynicism about politicians. People do not believe what our elected leaders tell us.

Paul Martin has slashed our health care funding. Our healthcare system has still not recovered from the massive Martin cuts. Across Canada, we have seen hospitals close, services reduced, and waiting lists grow longer. Then, in the heat of this election campaign, he tells us he'll fix it. How can we believe Paul Martin and the Martin team?

Ontario's Liberal Premier Dalton McGuinty, told us in the midst of a campaign, that he would not raise taxes. His first budget raises taxes, reduces our ability to seek chiropractic and eye care and then charges us a fee for this reduced service. We know we can't trust Dalton McGuinty and Paul Martin!

I am discouraged at what career politicians are promising and not delivering. I am not a career politician. I am a small business owner living in Thornhill, married with two children and I worry about the quality of their education, their safety to and from school and in class. Don't we all deserve a better future? I hope you feel the same way and that I can count on your vote on June 28th.

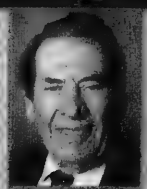
A Great City Makes History

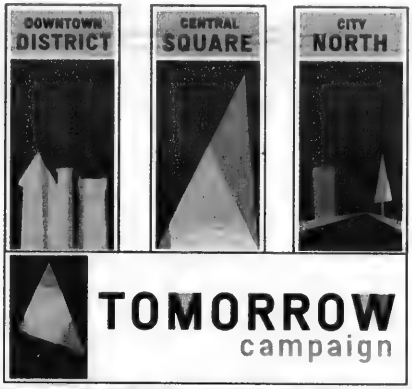
History is happening in Toronto with last month's launch of the Tomorrow Campaign, a precedent-setting $250 million revitalization initiative, powered by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Chaired by two of Canada's most respected business leaders, Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum, the Tomorrow Campaign will create new centres of health and wellness, education, culture, recreation, celebration and much more in three distinct Toronto areas:

Cabinet (In Formation)



w Campaign
orrow Today



rDowntown District, Central Square (Bathurst & Sheppard) and City North in York region.
Downtown District is anchored by the spacious, new Miles Nadal Jewish Community ntre and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, a home away from home for nearly 00 Jewish students at the University of Toronto and the Greater Toronto Area.

ntral Square, surrounded by a magnificent ravine setting, will feature a world-class, te-of-the-art facility, housing eight centres of excellence: the Koffler ntre of the Arts, the Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Learning, the ntre for Collective Memory & Understanding, the Children's Centre, The nior's Centre, the Centre for Health, Wellness & Recreation, the Centre Celebration and The Community Services Centre.

On a vast, 50 acre tract of land in Vaughan, City North will provide a wealth of services to York Region's growing Jewish population of 60,000. The first site to be developed will be the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), North America's largest Jewish community high school, complemented by elementary schools; a Mt. Sinai Hospital ambulatory clinic; a fitness and recreation facility; a summer camp; special needs housing and a community services complex.

Says Mayor Miller, "the three campuses that will be built through the Tomorrow Campaign are more than mere buildings, beautiful though they will be. They will be places that Torontonians will bring visitors to show off their city. They will foster a sense of community, not just among Toronto's Jewish community, but for everyone in the city."

Peterborough shul to share building with church

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Peterborough's only synagogue has reached a deal to share its building with a local Unitarian congregation.

The Beth Israel Synagogue had been looking for a co-tenant for a number of years and finally found "a really good fit" with the Unitarian Fellowship of Peterborough, said Beth Israel president Larry Gillman.

Both congregations "overwhelmingly" supported the proposal and signed a three-year lease agreement on June 14.

"For both of us, this will be a huge win-win [situation]," Gillman said. "It shows what happens when two communities can get together and talk things through."

The 35-family congregation was founded in the early 20th century and now has egalitarian, conservative-like services. Gillman said it had been seeking a rental partner because it was "running with a slight budget deficit," and was under-utilizing its 200-seat building, which was built in 1964.

Meanwhile, the fellowship, which went from 40 to 100 members over the last decade, had outgrown the Salvation Army church it was using for services and was looking to purchase or rent another facility.

Committees from the synagogue and fellowship discussed a variety of issues, including celebrations and holidays, keeping a kosher kitchen and different faith traditions.

"We sat down and clearly stated what our needs were in both communities," Gillman said.

"As a Jewish community we needed use of the building on the Sabbath and High Holy Days, which can often fall on a Sunday, and we wanted to remain a strictly kosher building."

The issue of keeping a kosher kitchen had the potential of being a "deal breaker," Gillman said.

However, the Unitarians saw it as an opportunity to learn more about Judaism, and they put together a "kitchen committee" that is learning what it means to be kosher and how to maintain a kosher building.

"It's a challenge for us," said Paula Greenwood, chair of the Unitarian Fellowship's board of directors. "We'll have to do our potlucks outside or somewhere else, but people are quite willing to learn."

The communities also had to discuss what will happen when a High Holy Day falls on a Sunday. They decided that the synagogue would use the building and the fellowship would change the time or day of its service.

"They're a very respectful group to our needs," Gillman said. "At no time did I feel like we were in negotiations over anything."

The Unitarian community needed to have a piano and sound system installed in the sanctuary, as well as a bulletin board and a sign outside the building. They also wanted to display their "beautiful quilts made by members," Greenwood said.

"None of these were really issues for us," Gillman said. "They'll turn off the sound system and cover the piano after their services. That way, we've maintained the integrity of the building, but have integrated them and welcomed them."

When discussions first began between the two congregations in January, Gillman and Greenwood said, they could see the similarities between the two religions.

"Their principles are very much aligned with our principles," he said.

A primary Unitarian belief is respect for other human beings. Unitarians also believe in "unity in diversity" and they stress the acceptance of diversity, as well as freedom of belief and teaching children about other religions.

"I think there's more that harmonizes us than causes division," said Greenwood.

Gillman and Greenwood said the partnership between the fellowship and synagogue will bring advantages to both.

"People really saw the benefits of doing this," said Gillman. "We get to increase revenues, fix up the building, act more like a charitable organization [with the new revenue], hire more rabbinical support [the shul brings in a rabbi for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur] and reach out from an interfaith point of view."

The Unitarians will benefit from increased space for children's religious education programs, more parking, an office with privacy for counselling and a sanctuary large enough to accommodate the growing congregation, Greenwood said.

There may be some challenges along the way, but "it's a very friendly and respectful agreement," she added.

Concert for peace unites artists from six faiths

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For a brief few hours on a recent Sunday evening in Ottawa, it seemed that world had laid down its arms and turned its swords into plowshares.

"One World, One People: A Concert for Peace" was a festive evening of song, dance and poetry performed by representatives of six faith groups to an overflow audience of enthusiastic supporters.

The brainchild of Cantor Daniel Benlolo, the concert was several months in the planning.

While performing for the Queen Elizabeth II a couple of years ago with his Shira Ottawa Choir, Benlolo met members of Interfaith Council. He kept in touch with them and they decided to put on a joint concert.

The Shira Ottawa Choir performed at the Concert for Peace, held recently at Ottawa's Congregation Beth Shalom.

Eventually, Marcia Cantor became co-chair of the project and she and Benlolo arranged to hold the event at Congregation Beth Shalom, where Benlolo is the cantor.

In her welcoming remarks at the concert, Cantor said, "Six distinct faiths have joined together in harmony to produce harmony, not for any profit, but just for peace… friendship is a reciprocal arrangement. To have a friend, you must be a friend."

Representing the Jewish community was the five-year-old Shira Ottawa Choir, which has performed in Canada and at the 19th Zimryia World Assembly of Choirs in Jerusalem. The Ottawa choir's repertoire includes Hebrew, English, Yiddish, Ladino, French and Spanish songs.

A 25-member group, including soloists, from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was featured, as was the Roman Catholic choir, the Schola Cantorum de la Cathédrale Notre-Dame, which performed a Gregorian Chant.

The Muslim community contributed a recitation from the Qu'ran, with an English translation, and a performance of Islamic nasheed (songs) in Arabic, English and Urdu by a children's choir.

Two dancers in colourful, exotic costumes from the Hindu community also delighted the audience.

A highlight of the evening was a performance by the composer and pianist Kevork Andonian, representing the Diocese of Armenian Church of Canada. The 26-year-old is pursuing a master's degree in music at the University of Ottawa. His playing brought the audience to its feet for a standing ovation.

In attendance were a number of dignitaries from various faith communities and representatives of several embassies, including Ronen-Gil Or from the Israeli Embassy, former deputy prime minister Herb Gray and MP Mauril Belanger.

The evening ended on a high note, when the performers and the audience of nearly 1,000 joined together to sing Oscar Peterson's Hymn to Freedom, concluding with the song lyric, "When every man joins in our song, and together singing harmony, that's when we'll be free."

Benlolo said he felt proud to have worked with the various groups that performed. "During the planning, we built a beautiful relationship. I have come to know these people as people… we have formed friendships and bonds.

"It is expected that this will be just the first of many such events."

For the boys

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I volunteer at a canteen for Israeli soldiers, called the Pina Chama (warm or cozy corner). It is a small building in Gush Etzion where the soldiers can come in to get cold or hot drinks, a mug of hot soup in the winter, cold watermelon in the summer, and cookies and cake. It was opened to honour the memories of two men from the area who were killed by terrorists.

Sometimes the soldiers race in for a quick drink, grab a cookie or two and race back out. Sometimes they sit around for a short time to relax and chat, play a game of checkers or warm up or cool off, depending on the season. They are mostly young boys in their late teens or early 20s, but often, men as old as 65 who volunteer their time for the army come in. We are grateful to have them in the area guarding us, and they are grateful for the warmth, friendliness, and snacks they receive from us.

The entire operation is funded by donations, some local, but primarily from the United States and Canada. All the cakes and cookies served are baked by volunteers. There is a movie theatre-type popcorn machine, and the popcorn is such a hit that we use 25 kilos of popcorn kernels a week.

These recipes are ones I often make to bring to the Pina Chama and they always vanish almost as soon as they're put out.

PEANUT BUTTER CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

The biggest problem with making these cookies is that once you do, your family will constantly beg you to make more. One soldier asked me for this cookie recipe so his mother could make them for him at home.

2½ cups flour
1½ tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
1 cup butter
1 cup peanut butter, preferably chunky
1 cup firmly packed brown sugar
2 eggs
1⅓ cups granulated sugar (divided)
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 375. Combine flour, baking soda, baking powder and salt in mixer bowl. Cream together butter, peanut butter, brown sugar and 1 cup of the granulated sugar till light and fluffy.

Beat in eggs and vanilla. Add chocolate chips and mix. Gradually add flour and mix till smooth. Shape into little balls and roll in remaining sugar. Press each ball down with a sugar-coated fork or a sugar-coated glass or cookie stamp. Bake 8 to 10 minutes until golden brown. Cool before transferring to rack. Makes about 36 cookies.

THREE-INGREDIENT PEANUT BUTTER COOKIES

These are the world's quickest, easiest peanut butter cookies. Truthfully, these cookies are not as wonderful as the above recipe, but if you're short on time and looking for quick and tasty, these are it. You could also add a cup of chocolate chips to the recipe.

1 egg
1 cup sugar
1 cup peanut butter, preferably super-chunk

Preheat oven to 350. Mix all together and drop on wax paper-lined cookie sheet. Dip a fork in sugar and press cookie to flatten. Bake at 350 until done, approximately 14-17 minutes (depending on oven).

Two Powerful Strategies for Seniors (part 2)

S. Jonathan Kirshblum,
B.A., CFP, FMA, FCSI
Financial Planner
Investment Advisor

A few years ago, one of my clients asked me to consider an investment for his 85-year old mother. She had $500,000 in a T-bill that earned very low interest. She had earmarked these funds for her children and wanted to protect the value of their future inheritance. She wanted to keep control of the money during her lifetime, but did not require access to the capital nor any investment income. The son asked me if there was an investment that would meet all of his mother's objectives but could potentially earn a greater rate of return. I told him there was such an investment.

Strategy 2 – Segregated Funds

Segregated funds are similar to mutual funds and have been offered exclusively by life insurance companies for more than 40 years. Numerous segregated funds are available today and, like mutual funds, many offer access to stock markets around the world. What differentiates segregated funds from mutual funds is that they also provide insurance benefits to investors. Benefits can vary from company to company, but all segregated funds offer the following basic benefits:

Maturity benefit From 75 - 100% of the original investment is guaranteed once at least 10 years have passed from the original purchase date – depending on the segregated fund chosen.

Death benefit From 75 - 100% of the original investment is guaranteed upon death – depending on the segregated fund chosen.

Probate fees Probate fees and associated legal costs may be avoided by naming beneficiaries in a segregated fund contract. Upon death, proceeds are paid directly to named beneficiaries.

No medical required While not considered a benefit, it is important to note that unlike most insurance products, no medical examination is required to purchase segregated funds.

Enhanced Benefits

Through the years, some insurance companies have offered enhanced maturity and/or death benefits to attract more investors. Some segregated funds offer valuable principle guarantees as high as 100% on maturity and/or death, however, it is always advisable to review benefits in detail as some companies may reduce guarantees at higher ages.

Principle guarantees do come at a cost. Like mutual funds, segregated funds express yearly costs to investors in a management expense ratio (MER); the cost of guarantees is embedded in the MER, which explains why a segregated fund MER is typically higher than that of a comparable mutual fund.

Many consider whether investments offering capital guarantees are worth any added expense. In the case of my client's mother, segregated funds proved an invaluable opportunity.

My client's mother decided to forego the nominal rate of interest she was earning on her T-bill in exchange for a chance to participate in the potential upside of the stock market through an equity segregated fund. The 100% principle guarantee on death offered by the insurance company she chose provided her the peace of mind, that, regardless of market conditions, her named beneficiaries would receive at least her invested capital when she died. As well, while her intention was not to liquidate the investment during her lifetime, she was satisfied knowing the investment was still in her name and could be sold anytime at prevailing market prices.

Lock-in Growth

Some insurance companies also introduced a "reset" feature that would allow investors to "lock-in" increases in a fund's value. In essence, an investor could "reset" the amount of the death and/or maturity benefit (in some cases several times each year) to include increasing portfolio gains during market upswings. Upon death, the most recent reset amount would be paid out to named beneficiaries; liquidation at any point before death of the insured would be at then prevailing market prices.

Comforted by a principle death benefit guarantee, my client's mother invested $500,000 in a Canadian equity segregated fund. The portfolio increased in value 15% in each of the first three years and each time she exercised the reset option: this increased the death benefit guarantee to over $760,000. By the time she died, the fund value had decreased to $400,000; despite this subsequent downturn, her named beneficiary still received a cheque for $760,437 (free of probate fees).

Other Family Members can Invest
Investor vs. "Life Insured"

An investor in a segregated fund need not be the "life insured" named in the contract. The life insured is the individual upon whose life the contract is based; upon his or her death, benefits are paid to the named beneficiaries. While the life insured may be the investor, as was the case with my client's mother, other members of the family may also invest in segregated funds naming the same senior as the life insured. My middle-aged client was able to invest his own money in a segregated fund, naming his mother as the life insured. During her lifetime, he was able to enjoy the same principle guarantees and lock-in benefits; when she died, he received the last reset value of the policy.

The suitability of segregated funds, like all other investment strategies, must be judged within the context of an investor's personal situation and goals. Seniors interested in combining the benefits of investing with the merits of estate planning should consult an insurance advisor whether segregated funds should be included in their overall financial plan.

Cool 1 minute on cookie sheets, then transfer to wire racks to cool completely. Store in tightly covered container.

MUD CAKE

This is so quick and simple to make everyone loves it. Every time it's put out, it's gone in a flash. This recipe is for a 9x9-inch pan; however, I always double it and make it in a 9x13-inch pan.

1½ cups flour
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. cocoa
5 tbsp. oil
1 tbsp. vinegar
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup water
¼-⅓ cup nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Mix all the ingredients together. Pour into 9x9-in. greased pan and bake for 30 minutes. Cool and frost with peanut butter frosting. Makes 12 servings.

Note: If you double this recipe it will need to bake for about 10 minutes longer.

PEANUT BUTTER FROSTING

Will frost a 9x9-inch cake

3 tbsp. margarine
1 cup peanut butter
1¼ cup powdered sugar

Melt margarine in a saucepan over low heat; add peanut butter and powdered sugar. Stir until melted and spread over cake.

Note: If you accidentally overcook this frosting, it will turn to fudge.

JUMBO FRUITED OATMEAL COOKIES

¼ cup butter or margarine, softened
3 eggs
¾ cup apple juice concentrate
1½ tsp. vanilla
1½ cups flour
1½ cups oats
½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp.ground allspice
6 oz. dried mixed fruit, chopped
½ cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Beat butter or margarine in large bowl until creamy. Blend in eggs, apple juice concentrate and vanilla. Add flour, oats, baking soda, salt, cinnamon and allspice; mix well. Stir in dried fruit and nuts. Drop scant ¼ cupfuls of dough, 3 in. apart, onto lightly greased cookie sheets; flatten slightly. Bake 12-14 minutes, until edges are lightly browned. Makes 18 cookies.

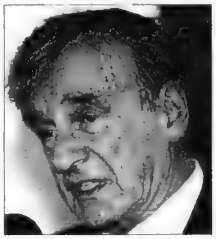
UN discusses anti-Semitism

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The first-ever United Nations conference on anti-Semitism, held Monday, is a serious step forward, Jewish leaders say, because although anti-Semitism is escalating worldwide, the UN has been ignoring it.

The daylong conference for non-governmental organizations (NGOs) came at the request of Shashi Tharoor, the UN undersecretary general for communications and public information.



Elie Wiesel

In his opening address, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said Jews must feel that "the United Nations is their home."

Keynote speaker, author Elie Wiesel, a Nobel laureate and Holocaust survivor, told the seminar he thought anti-Semitism had died at Auschwitz. However, he said, it has turned out that Auschwitz killed Jews but anti-Semitism lives on.

Annan said Monday the UN must help battle anti-Semitism, and called on the members of the UN to pass a resolution against anti-Semitism at September's General Assembly meeting.

"The fight against anti-Semitism must be our fight, and the Jews everywhere must feel that the United Nations is their home," Annan said.

He also called on the human rights organizations affiliated with the UN to "actively explore a way of combating anti-Semitism more effectively in the future.

"We owe it to ourselves, as well as to our Jewish brothers and sisters, to stand firmly against the particular type of hatred that anti-Semitism represents, and that means we must be prepared to examine the nature of today's manifestations of anti-Semitism more closely," Annan said.

Other Jewish leaders who were to address the conference felt the move by the UN to hold the conference was a positive sign, although they felt the real test will be its outcome.

"The very fact that they are having an all-day conference to address this subject at a time when the institution was not willing or able to condemn it is an important message," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, who was to speak at the seminar.

Throughout its history, the United Nations has been reluctant to address anti-Semitism in its own right, instead condemning it together with other forms of bigotry.

Last fall, Ireland drafted the first UN resolution to explicitly condemn anti-Semitism but withdrew it due to fierce opposition from Arab and Muslim states.

The UN's one-sided resolutions and discussions critical of Israel not only delegitimize the Jewish state but let "anti-Zionism become a legitimate mask for anti-Semitism," said Felice Gaer, director of the American Jewish Committee's Jacob Blaustein Institute for Human Rights, who was to be a panellist.

"In a way, Annan is trying to restore the credibility of the United Nations as a body that has a universal concern to prevent the promotion of hate bigotry, discrimination, for everybody," said Gaer.

Both Annan and Tharoor are "saying they believe the UN should stand up for what's right, not cower with fear at the bigotry of others who would silence the UN," she added.

While praising the effort, Jewish officials hoped the seminar would result in an action plan.

Others say it's up to Jewish groups to plant those seeds.

For example, Jewish officials have discussed the possibility of securing a UN General Assembly resolution condemning anti-Semitism or the appointment of an official to monitor anti-Semitism.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations recently called on the UN General Assembly to adopt a resolution condemning anti-Semitism, similar to one passed at an Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe conference on anti-Semitism held in Berlin in April.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the presidents conference, said he would reiterate that plea and call for internal monitoring of UN agencies that occasionally fall prey to anti-Semitism. He cited, for example, statements involving Holocaust denial by members of the UN Commission on Human Rights.

At the June 21 seminar, the World Jewish Congress (WJC) hoped to stress consensus points worked out at a meeting of dozens of Jewish NGOs last week.

In his statement, WJC president Edgar Bronfman was to call for a General Assembly resolution condemning anti-Semitism, an annual UN report listing anti-Semitic incidents and plans to combat them, and the appointment by Annan of an assistant to deal with the question of anti-Semitism, said the WJC's executive vice-president, Elan Steinberg.

Bronfman wants to ensure the seminar is not a "one-shot event," Steinberg said.

Eve Epstein, an advisor to the UN's department of public information, which coordinated the event, said she thinks the seminar "signals the UN's willingness to influence the world's NGO's – which have, in large measure, been so unwilling to confront the issue of anti-Semitism, and indeed have sometimes contributed to its resurgence."

Epstein stressed that she was expressing her personal opinion, not that of the public information department.

"This conference is an answer to Durban," she said, referring to the UN's 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, which erupted in a frenzy of anti-Semitic rhetoric and activism.

Since assuming his post a few years ago, Tharoor has considered ways to combat rising anti-Semitism, Epstein said. Cutting editorials last winter in the Wall Street Journal and Commentary magazine, and conversations with Jewish leaders, made him increase his efforts.

"UN Secretary General Kofi Annan – who has occasionally paid lip-service to the problem of anti-Semitism – ignored the requests of both NGOs and the state sponsors of the anti-Semitism resolution to weigh in on the importance of the issue with UN members, or to press the point with the Organization of the Islamic Conference, just as he has never convened a conference or written a report dedicated to anti-Semitism," Canadian Anne Bayefsky, an adjunct professor at Columbia University Law School, wrote in the Wall Street Journal.

"The UN is an organization founded on the ashes of the Jewish people and whose core human rights principles were drafted from the lessons of the Holocaust," she wrote. "The inability of the organization to address seriously one of the very evils it was intended to prevent is a scandal of global proportions."

U.S. sources say Hezbollah sending fighters to Iraq

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The radical Lebanese Shi'ite organization Hezbollah has been moving fighters to Iraq in recent months to battle American troops, U.S. intelligence sources say.

The transfer has been carried out through Syria, following an Iranian initiative, the sources say. The transit through Syrian territory has been permitted by Damascus along its porous border with Iraq.

The Hezbollah fighters moving to Iraq are part of a broader force of pro-Iranian militants that operates in Iraq to destabilize the country and undermine American forces there.

Analysts believe the movement of the Hezbollah fighters to Iraq serves the interests of both Tehran and Damascus, which favour instability in Iraq for their own reasons.

Iran is eager to see the Hezbollah fighters establish operations in Iraq before a new regime is installed in Baghdad.

Still, there is no sign that Iran and its Lebanese surrogate are abandoning the friction along Lebanon's border with Israel, which is still considered to be Hebollah's primary focus.

In its interim report, the U.S. Congressional bipartisan commission of inquiry into the events of 9/11 states that co-operation between Hezbollah and Al-Qaida is extensive.

U.S. officials said recently that Syria has not seriously responded to American demands to seal its border with Iraq against the transit of "foreign fighters." According to U.S. sources, neither a letter to Syrian President Bashar Assad from U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell nor the subsequent U.S. decision to impose sanctions on Syria had the desired effect on Damascus.

On the other hand, Syria last weekend did extradite a terrorist suspect to France. The man had come into Syrian territory from Iraq and is suspected of being a deputy of Al Qaeda operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Intelligence sources note the involvement of Hezbollah in Iraq is restricted to operations in that country alone and does not include the movement of other radical Islamic elements for operations in southern Lebanon.

Begin museum opens

An interactive museum and informal education facility promoting Menachem Begin's legacy has opened in Jerusalem. The $16 million (US) building honouring the former Israeli prime minister, based on the concept of American presidential libraries, was financed by donations from foundations and private individuals worldwide. The centre faces the walls of Jerusalem's Old City.

From Gush Katif to Etzion?

Israeli officials reportedly have ordered West Bank settlements expanded to house Israelis evacuated from the Gaza Strip. On Tuesday, Israel's daily Ma'ariv reported that Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz has drawn up plans for new residential construction in the West Bank's Gush Etzion area. The new homes are to be offered to the nearly 8,000 settlers slated for removal from Gaza, Ma'ariv said. Officials were not immediately available for comment on the report. The United States has spoken out against expanding West Bank settlements as part of Israel's plan to disengage from Gaza.

France: No deal with Israel

France has denied Israeli media reports that it is set to sign an arms deal with the Jewish state. Ha'aretz reported last week week that France was set to spend $200 million (US) to buy material for unmanned planes from Israel Aeronautics Industries. However, France's defence ministry said no such deal is in the pipeline.

Philadelphi route moat

The Defence Ministry issued a tender for the digging of a ditch along the border of Israel and Egypt south of the Gaza Strip. According to the specifications, the ditch – or moat – will be four kilometers long, 15 to 25 metres deep and 100 to 120 metres wide. Senior officials said the ditch will be dug along the Philadelphi route and will be ready before the withdrawal from Gaza is completed by the end of 2005.

Terror rocket escalation

Palestinians fired a new, advanced type of Qassam rocket at a residential area of Sderot early last Friday morning, Israel Radio reported. The rocket attack constituted an escalation, in that the more sophisticated rocket, called a Nasser 3 rocket, carries more explosive material and has a longer range than the type of Qassam Palestinians usually use in attacks, the report said.

Change in Syrian policy?

The Persian Gulf newspaper Al-Watan cited sources in Syria's ruling Ba'ath Party that Damascus is drawing up a new policy whereby it would be willing to recognize the Jewish state if it relinquishes lands conquered in the 1967 Six-Day War.

Arafat says he accepts Israel's Jewish character

By AKIVA ELDAR and DAVID LANDAU
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat "definitely" understands that Israel must preserve its character as a Jewish state, he told Ha'aretz in an interview last week.

This is the first time Arafat has said he recognizes the state's Jewish character – he had previously refrained from doing so, to avoid offending Israel's Arab citizens.

In the interview at his office in Ramallah last Tuesday, Arafat pointed out that the PLO had adopted the Arab Summit resolution of April 2002. This resolution, based on a Saudi initiative, called for a just and agreed solution to the Palestinian refugee problem based on UN General Assembly Resolution 194.

However, he declined to say how many refugees he would insist Israel absorb as a condition for any peace agreement. He stressed that he had to solve the problem of some 200,000 refugees who live in very difficult conditions in Lebanon, and he asked "why the Christians from Russia have the right to come and the Palestinian Christian has not the right to come?"

Amos Malka, the former head of Israeli Military Intelligence, told Ha'aretz in an interview published June 11 that Arafat would be willing to compromise on the return of only 20,000 to 30,000 refugees to Israel.

Regarding borders, Arafat essentially confirmed Malka's assessment – that he would be willing to sign an agreement under which Israel would withdraw from 97 to 98 per cent of the West Bank and give the Palestinians territory equivalent in size and quality to the 2 to 3 per cent that would be annexed to Israel. He also said that under any agreement, Israel would retain sovereignty over the Western Wall and the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City, and Israelis would be granted freedom of access to holy sites under Palestinian control. The Palestinians would require sovereignty over the rest of east Jerusalem, including the Temple Mount.

Yasser Arafat

Arafat said that he was puzzled that the Israeli government does not view him as a partner for peace, pointing out that even Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had sent numerous messages to Arafat via the prime minister's son, Omri. Sharon also accepted various diplomatic and security initiatives – including the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan – that were formulated in consultation with Arafat.

Arafat pledged that once the Israel Defence Forces withdraw from Gaza, the PA would take control of the area and fight not only Hamas members, but also Fatah members who seek to break the law.

He noted that British intelligence, which is monitoring the security situation in the territories on behalf of the Quartet – Russia, the United Nations, the European Union and the United States – recently published a positive report on the Palestinian security services' efforts to foil suicide bombings in Israel.

In one case, Palestinian police arrested a 17-year-old Bedouin girl who had planned to blow herself up in Israel. The arrest took place in a part of the territories that is under full Israeli security control.

Israeli and Canadian charged in plot to ship night goggles to Hezbollah

By YOSSI MELMAN and SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The head of a Canadian shipping company and an Israeli were indicted last week for planning to ship state-of the-art night-vision equipment to Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Naji Antoine Abi Khalil, 39, chairman and general manager of New Line Services, a shipping company based in Montreal, and Tomer Grinberg, 30, an Israeli living in New York, were named in the indictment filed in Manhattan federal court.

Khalil, who has dual citizenship in Canada and Lebanon, is charged with attempting to supply material support and resources to a terrorist organization and attempting to supply goods to a terrorist.

He and Grinberg are both charged with conspiring to export sensitive military night-vision equipment without U.S. government licences.

If convicted, Khalil faces a maximum combined penalty of 30 years in jail and a $750,000 fine. Grinberg faces a maximum five years' imprisonment and a $250,000 fine.

The indictment replaces a complaint on lesser charges filed against Khalil last month. Prosecutors accuse Khalil of agreeing to send night-vision goggles, infrared aiming devices and other equipment to Hezbollah, which the indictment describes as a terrorist group.

The charges allege that on May 17 and 18, Khalil met an undercover FBI agent at a hotel in New York's Times Square area to discuss a shipment of stolen electronics that needed to be exported. The agent told Khalil he had a customer who wanted to ship night-vision goggles to Hezbollah in Athens, Greece. Khalil allegedly said it wasn't a problem and he had "friends."

The charges state that during another meeting, the agent introduced Khalil to another undercover FBI agent who was posing as the customer. He gave Khalil the address of individuals who would receive the shipment and Khalil agreed to create a fictitious bill of lading so the items and the identity of the shipper would not be revealed.

On May 19, Khalil and Grinberg met the undercover agent at a Manhattan storage facility to pick up the night-vision equipment, the indictment said. The agent showed the defendants a crate filled with 14 pieces of Generation 3 night-vision equipment, the highest level of night-vision technology, which may not be exported from the United States without a license.

Khalil and Grinberg loaded the equipment into a minivan and Khalil accepted a $2,500 down payment from the agent for the shipment to Greece.

As of last week, the American authorities have not contacted the Israeli consulate in New York about Grinberg's arrest.

Diplomatic sources in Israel said last week they are trying to contact the New York Police Department and the FBI to be brought up to date on the case.

"At this stage there has been no request from Grinberg, his family or his attorney," a source in the Israeli consulate in New York said.

Museum project brings Arab and Jewish youngsters together

By YONIT BAT MOSHE
Israel Press Service

JERUSALEM — The Bible Lands Museum has, for the past six years, operated the Image of Abraham project.

With the participation of Jerusalem's Paula Ben-Gurion and Ramat Moriah schools, as well as the Al-Ukhwah school in Jabel Mukaber, the program this year brought together Arab and Jewish fourth-graders and their parents to learn about the role of Abraham as Patriarch in Judaism and Islam.

Inspired by the Bible Lands Museum's artifacts, which trace the history of the Ancient Near East and highlight the common elements in both the Arab and Jewish heritage, the project aims to build a foundation for understanding and mutual respect, based on participants learning about similarities as well as differences in Judaism and Islam.

A series of models created by the students this year can be seen at the museum. The exhibit, Abraham's Journey, represents the regions traversed by Abraham on his journey from Ur to Canaan.

Hand in hand, Arab and Jewish youngsters build a foundation for understanding and mutual respect by participating in the Image of Abraham project, in which they learn about the similarities and differences in Judaism and Islam.

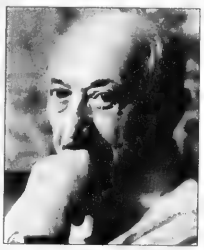
Wiesenthal awarded a British knighthood

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — Britain has awarded an honorary knighthood to Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal in recognition of a "lifetime of service to humanity."



Simon Wiesenthal

Wiesenthal, 95, survived incarceration in Nazi prison camps in eastern Europe during World War II and has since dedicated his life to bringing those Germans and others responsible for the Holocaust to justice.

He is perhaps best-known for his role in tracking down Adolf Eichmann, the one-time SS leader who organized the extermination of the Jews. Eichmann was found in Argentina, abducted by Israeli agents in 1960, tried and hung for crimes committed against the Jews.

The British Foreign Office said John Macgregor, Britain's ambassador to Austria, gave Wiesenthal the award June 18 during a ceremony in the Nazi-hunter's home.

The knighthood also recognized the work of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, which was founded in 1977 to promote remembrance of the Holocaust and the defence of human rights.

When he first announced the honorary knighthood in February, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Wiesenthal "has been untiring in his service to the Jewish communities in the UK and elsewhere by helping to right at least some of the awful wrongs of the Holocaust."

"If there is one name which symbolizes this vital coming to terms with the past, it is Simon Wiesenthal's," Straw said.

Because he is not a British citizen, Wiesenthal can't use "Sir" in front of his name, but he can put the letters "KBE" after it. The initials stand for Knight Commander of the British Empire.

On synagogue's 100th birthday, Rome's Jews remember liberation

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Rabbi Vittorio Della Rocca was only 11 years old at the time, but he will never forget a historic Shabbat at Rome's Great Synagogue 60 years ago.

June 9, 1944 – just five days after Allied troops had liberated the city from the Nazis – was the first Friday night of freedom. An American Jewish chaplain led 4,000 Jews in the Shehechiyanu prayer.

"It was an incredible scene of joy and euphoria," Rabbi Della Rocca says. "There was a black spot, though, as everyone among us started counting to see if they could find all their loved ones."

The Rome congregation was the first large synagogue in Europe to be liberated.

The American chaplain was Lt. Morris Kertzer, a young rabbi from Iowa City, Iowa. Attached to the U.S. Fifth Army, he had landed with thousands of other U.S. troops at Anzio and witnessed the Allied liberation of Rome on June 4.

Rabbi Kertzer died two decades ago.

But this month, almost 60 years to the day after that historic Shabbat service, the Rome Jewish community presented a hand-lettered scroll of appreciation to his son, David.

A professor at Brown University, David Kertzer has gained renown in recent years for his books on Italian Jewish history, including The Popes Against the Jews: The Vatican's Role in the Rise of Anti-Semitism and The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara, which recounts the story of the abduction by the Church and forced conversion of a young Jewish boy in Bologna in 1858.

"For my father and for all Jewish American soldiers, to participate in the liberation of Europe was an extraordinary experience," Kertzer said.

"My father's experiences here had a big impact on me, and it's not really a coincidence that I chose the field of study that I did," he said.

During World War II, deportations of Italian Jews began only after the Nazis occupied Italy in September 1943.

Many Jews in Rome found refuge in the homes of Christian friends or in Catholic institutions, but methodical round-ups and searches led to the deportation of more than 2,000 Roman Jews to Auschwitz. About 8,000 Italian Jews in all were deported.

The Rome community's award this month, presented by the city's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni, and the president of the Jewish community, Leone Paserman, came during an international conference June 16 and 17, held to honour the synagogue's 100th anniversary.

"During their 10 months of occupation, the Nazis had sealed the synagogue but didn't desecrate it," Paserman said. "On that first Friday night after the liberation, Jews from all over the city emerged from hiding and made their way to the temple.

"It's important to remember that the war was still going on elsewhere, and there would still be 11 months before peace was declared," he said.

The Great Synagogue in Rome

Rabbi Kertzer himself wrote vividly about his experiences in Rome in a book of memoirs published in 1947.

Accompanied by another Jewish chaplain, Rabbi Aaron Paperman, he wrote, he entered Rome in "a jeep sandwiched between a tank and a truck" as part of an impromptu military parade, cheered on by a million Italians. The two rabbis immediately sought out the local Jewish community.

"We were probably the first tourists since 1939 to ask, 'Dove la sinagoga, per favore?'" Rabbi Kertzer wrote.

"The following Friday, on the ninth day of June, the first large synagogue in liberated Europe opened its doors," he wrote. "Four thousand men, women, and children streamed into the high-domed house of worship. Vast though the temple is, every inch of space was occupied."

In a brief, English-language sermon, Rabbi Kertzer told the Jews of Rome that the Allied soldiers shared their burdens, and he stressed the sense of unity that bound Jews worldwide.

"We Americans, from all walks of life, wearing the uniform of America, have flocked to the house of God. And we saw Jewish soldiers from England and Canada, Jewish soldiers wearing the insignia of Eretz Yisrael, proudly enter your beautiful synagogue to join in prayer," he told them.

Rabbi Kertzer shared the bimah with Rabbi Israel Zolli, the elderly and controversial chief rabbi of Rome, and at least two other rabbis. Rabbi Zolli, however, is almost never mentioned by Italian Jews, and his role in the liberation celebration was not brought up when Kertzer was honoured.

The reason is painful, embarrassing and bitterly ironic. After the liberation, Jewish community leaders accused Rabbi Zolli of having abandoned his post and his congregation during the Nazi occupation and fired him as chief rabbi. The Allies reinstated him, but the conflict split the community.

In February 1945, just six months after the joyful liberation Shabbat, Rabbi Zolli effectively ended the dispute by announcing his conversion to Roman Catholicism.

U.S. and Europe disagree over how to fight hate

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Americans and Europeans agree on the need to combat anti-Semitism and racism on the Internet.

They just disagree over how it should be done.

At a two-day conference in Paris last week organized by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), U.S. and European delegates differed sharply, and publicly, over how to maintain the boundaries between the preservation of freedom of speech and governments' fight against cyber-haters.

In a keynote speech at the conference, Robert Badinter, one of Europe's leading human rights jurists and a former French justice minister, expressed the widespread European view that democracies have the right to curb freedom of expression when it comes to anti-Semitism and racism.

"We are no longer living at the time of Thomas Jefferson," Badinter said. "We must adapt our necessary freedoms to an age where people are trying to threaten those freedoms."

Badinter's viewpoint was received positively by most of the OSCE's 55 member states. OSCE chair, Bulgarian Foreign Minister Salomon Passy, said that "freedom does not include the unrestricted right to spread hatred."

However, the United States strongly opposed calls by delegates to censor those who spread racism and anti-Semitism over the Internet. U.S. Assistant Attorney General Dan Bryant said the U.S. government opposes attempts that might suppress or censor Internet sites.

"The Internet is not an enemy of tolerance and human dignity," Bryant said, referring to the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. While there is "a threat to be feared," Bryant said the United States prefers to rely on "the marketplace of ideas." He said there is a certain "social value" in allowing those with unpleasant opinions to express their views.

Badinter said, "Imagine what would have happened if Dr. Goebbels had the Internet," a reference to the notorious Nazi propaganda chief. "We're not dealing anymore with someone printing 4,000 copies of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion at the end of the 19th century," he said. "These sites reach millions of people."

At the Budapest Convention of 2001, which took aim at Internet crime, countries agreed to collaborate on such matters as confidentiality, child pornography and intellectual property. But the treaty so far has been ratified by only six out of some 40 signatories.

The United States, which signed the Budapest Convention, strongly opposed another treaty, in Strasbourg, France, in 2003, which called for the criminalization of racist and xenophobic material as well as threats and racist insults pronounced in public, and the diffusion of works that deny the Holocaust. The United States says it violates the First Amendment's right to free speech.

Brian Marcus, director of Internet monitoring for the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League, said the difference in attitudes toward Internet hate speech can be a plus.

"We can work together. If people use hate material in Holland, Dutch organizations can bring prosecutions, while we in the U.S. can instruct the providers to remove the information from their servers," Marcus said.

In that respect, the U.S. providers are "choosing to be good citizens" by defining clear rules of service, he said.

While the U.S. Constitution protects the right to free speech, there is still a gamut of potential legal channels to crack down on hate speech, noted Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the U.S.-based Simon Wiesenthal Center.

He cited the example of a racist site that had downloaded Microsoft's logo for its own use, changing "business solution" to "final solution." The logo alteration was opposed by a lawsuit that steered clear of First Amendment issues.

Bryant said the U.S. Department of Justice can take legal action against Internet hate sites without compromising the right to free expression.

He cited the example of a 1996 case in the United States in which threatening and racist e-mails were sent to Asian students at the University of California. In that case, the sender ran afoul of federal civil rights laws that prohibit "interference by force or threat of force based on race or national origin with a person's attendance at a public university."

The offender ultimately received a one-year prison sentence.

But Badinter noted that the vast majority of hateful Web sites are hosted in the United States.

Suzette Brockhorst, secretary general of the International Network Against Cyber Hate, said many hate sites today go "jurisdiction shopping. A lot wind up in the U.S., where everything is protected by the First Amendment."

She said appeals to service providers to remove the Web sites are not sufficient because "it's Internet users who should be responsible for their actions."

She also noted that there are cases in which U.S. officials seem not as concerned about free-speech rights, particularly when it comes to dealing with child pornography.

"If it's done in child pornography, why can't it be done with hate speech?" she asked.

Foundation promotes graphology in field of mental health

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Graphology, or handwriting analysis, is being introduced as a serious assessment tool for mental health professionals in North America, says an expert on the subject.

Torontonian Annette Poizner, who recently completed her PhD in counselling psychology at OISE at the University of Toronto on the use of graphology in psychotherapy, says graphology is underused in clinical practice.

While Poizner was training in Israel a decade ago, graphology was being used more frequently there than any other personality test, including by moshavim when admitting new residents, by companies looking for new employees and by Israeli clinical psychologists.

"When used alongside other projective assessment measures, graphology can reveal the underlying and often obscured personal issues that drive a range of mental health problems, including tenacious conditions that involve obsessive compulsive symptoms – conditions that are often only minimally responsive to traditional psychotherapy," says Poizner, who is also a graduate of the Columbia University School of Social Work.

"Projective assessment" includes the analysis of handwriting and drawings, as well as the interpretation of early memories. When symptoms have been resistant to treatment, projective assessment tends to show that, though the symptoms may be problematic, they are not the root problem, Poizner says.

Annette Poizner

"Most symptoms are seemingly imposed by the unconscious mind to manage another problem that has evaded conscious awareness. The root problem needs to be identified and managed."

She says when this occurs, symptoms will often improve quickly and dramatically.

Poizner is a director of the Milton H. Erickson Institute of Toronto, which trains therapists in the use of hypnosis and other applications of Ericksonian psychotherapy. The Milton E. Erickson Foundation is an international consortium that promotes the use of techniques developed by the famous psychiatrist, who did not believe in drawn-out therapy.

In her dissertation, Poizner wrote that several clients and therapists were surprised by the accuracy of handwriting analysis.

"There is an excitement and trend in psychotherapy to get results quickly by using strategic short-term approaches. The people who come for Brief Therapy [a counselling method influenced by Erickson's work] are usually people who have tried conventional therapy without success.

"I am trying to bring graphology and projective testing to the attention of colleagues, so they can see how it expedites Brief Therapy."

Poizner founded and currently chairs the Jewish Health Alliance, a grassroots network for health-care practitioners with an interest in the relationship between Jewish thought and healing.

Poizner will be speaking at Israel's: The Judaica Centre, 870A Eglinton Ave. W. on Thursday, July 8 at 8 p.m. about "Handwriting and Personality." The cost is $10.

Terrorist attack survivor lauds Shaare Zedek

On Jan. 22, 2002, Shayna Gould, a 19-year-old American student in her second year of study at Neve Yerushalayim seminary in Jerusalem, was pronounced clinically dead after a terrorist affiliated with the Fatah Tanzim's Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade opened fire on Jaffa Road.

Two women were killed and 42 others were injured. When Gould arrived at Shaare Zedek Medical Center with her left lung punctured and no pulse or blood pressure, the cardiothoracic surgeon, an Israeli Arab, and his team, which included a Palestinian doctor, massaged her heart back to life and removed her lung. The doctors believed that her chance for a full recovery was one in a million.

Shayna Gould
[Sandler Photography]

Gould now lives in Chicago. She was in Toronto recently to speak of her "outstanding" treatment at Shaare Zedek Hospital and her "miraculous recovery," at a Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation fundraising dinner hosted by Warren and Debbie Kimel.

In an interview, Gould spoke of the immediate response by the Magen David Adom after the shooting. "The ambulance driver was there in moments and saw me get shot. His intercom with the hospital was not working. He called his wife, who is a nurse at the hospital, on his cell, and the surgical team was ready for me."

The hospital arranged for her parents, sister and brother-in-law to arrive in Israel within 24 hours. After several weeks in hospital and further care during a supervised stay in a hotel, she returned to Chicago and began physiotherapy, because she could not move her left arm as a result of back muscle surgery to close her incision.

"Shaare Zedek saved my life," she said. "I now have full dexterity and I work part time.

"Shaare Zedek is not just a hospital. It is so much more. They were so loving and gave of themselves to a degree that I have never seen anywhere else."

Gould said everything happens for a reason. "Things happen in your life – good and bad – and you are supposed to view everything as the will of God."

She adds that "even though what happened to me was terrible, it doesn't change my love for Israel and I look forward to returning to Israel in the near future."

At the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation dinner, chaired by Michael Bregman, the honorees were Kurt and Edith Rothschild, community leaders who have been affiliated with Shaare Zedek for more than three decades.

The funds raised at the dinner will go towards Shaare Zedek's new 32,300-square-foot emergency department, scheduled to be opened in August 2004. The facility will be three times larger than the existing department. Because of its central location, Shaare Zedek receives many of the victims when terrorism strikes in the area. — C.G.

Josh Freed just wants a little shut-eye

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Having trouble sleeping? Consider yourself in good company. Among history's famous insomniacs are Leonardo da Vinci, Napoleon, Vincent van Gogh and Catherine the Great.

In fact, about a third of us have trouble sleeping.

Josh Freed, an award-winning filmmaker and columnist for the Montreal Gazette, is one of them. His latest film In Search of Sleep: An Insomniac's Journey (on CBC Television's Witness June 23, 8 p.m. EDT) takes us on his quest to explore his insomnia and to find a cure.

As Freed says, "I haven't slept like a baby since I was a baby."

He tries everything, from elaborate sleep aid gizmos to a custom-made NASA space bed. He tries a sleep clinic and New Age techniques.

Unfortunately, at the end of his quest, he has to admit, "Insomnia is hard to cure, and my problem may never go away."

So, if you can't find a cure, is there someone or something to blame?

Freed suggests blaming Thomas Edison, who changed the way we sleep with his invention of the light bulb. Prior to this innovation, humans averaged nine hours of sleep each night. Now, we average only seven, and many of us try to make do with less.

Freed's quest ends in Seville, Spain, where the afternoon siesta is still very popular. A one-hour power nap in the middle of the day is more than enough to allow people to get by on a few hours of sleep at night.

But in North America and many other countries, a midday snooze is hard to come by. Even in Spain and other Mediterranean countries, the siesta is going the way of the dinosaur.

However, one innovative company in Spain offers its employees a one-hour massage/nap time. If only we could convince our bosses that this is a good idea. After all, research shows that a midday snooze does increase afternoon productivity.

Lacking hard-hitting scientific facts and solutions, Freed takes a typically whimsical, and lighthearted approach to a serious topic.

Maybe CBC ought to run this documentary again at 3 a.m. for those of us who, like Freed, find ourselves wide awake.

The Cultural Guide To Jewish Europe is comprehensive yet concise

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Cultural Guide To Jewish Europe, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, comes out at a peculiar time.

On the one hand, Europe is beset by a new wave of anti-Semitism, aggravated by the Arab-Israeli conflict.

On the other hand, there is a renewed interest on the part of non-Jews in Europe's Jewish past, which brings us back to this lavishly-illustrated 613-page compendium.

Compiled by an army of contributors, this guide covers Europe like the early morning dew. Comprehensive yet concise, it is underpinned by a firm grasp of and an appreciation for history.

Did you know, for example, that mid-18th century Amsterdam had the largest Jewish community in Europe, and that Holland was the first European nation to accept Jews in parliament?

Perusing the chapter on Germany, I learned something else. The Weissensee cemetery in Berlin, which contains the tombstones of famous persons running the gamut from the theologian Leo Baeck to the philosopher Hermann Cohen, is one of the largest Jewish cemeteries in Europe.

Moving on to Portugal, I discovered that in the early 19th century, some 500 years after their expulsion during the Inquisition, Jews were permitted to live openly and freely there. But in the town of Belmonte, amazingly enough, there is still a crypto-Jewish community.

Flipping through the section on Italy, I found out that Jews have lived in Rome for the past 2,000 years and that their monuments, from the Jewish catacombs to the Ostia Antica synagogue, trace their long presence in the Eternal City.

Reading about the capital of eastern Slovakia, Kosice, I learned that a once-vibrant Jewish community has been reduced to a rump of some 800 inhabitants.

Prague's charming old Jewish quarter, which I had the pleasure of visiting almost 30 years ago, is described in detail. A footnote on the Charles Bridge is intriguing. It informs readers that the third statue on the right contains a golden inscription in Hebrew.

There is an abundance of material about Poland, which was home to 3.3 million Jews before the Holocaust. My attention was particularly drawn to a former Jewish neighbourhood in Krakow, Kazimierz, where several scenes of Schindler's List were filmed, and to Lesko, where a 17th century fortified synagogue still stands.

Turning to page 469, where the chapter on continental Greece starts, I read that Jews returned to Athens in the 19th century after many centuries.

Although 54 percent of Gomel's population was Jewish in 1897, Jews in that Belarussian city have virtually vanished. As a result, a synagogue with colonnades has been supplanted by a pedestrian movie theatre, and a cemetery has fallen into ruins.

In Brody, a city in Ukraine where Jews comprised 80 percent of the population a century ago, the walls of a 17th-century shul remain intact and Jewish-style courtyards can still be seen.

The last entry is on the Finnish city of Trondheim. Here you will find the world's northernmost synagogue, which, for a year, served as a train station.

Such curiosities, large and small, fill the pages of The Cultural Guide To Jewish Europe, an eye-opener of a book.

Actress makes a splash in bathroom comedy

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

"When a little girl is given as many lines as I have, there's still hope for dreams," says Little Sally, the small, hyperactive character in Urinetown. The statement can also apply to Jennifer Waiser, the Montreal-born actress who plays Little Sally.

Waiser, 26, has done more in her short career than many have done in a lifetime. She has appeared in more than 13 productions, including Evita and Fiddler on the Roof, and a few weeks ago, began a four-month run in Urinetown.

Waiser's love of theatre lights began with an Ottawa theatre company when she was in high school there. "They did community theatre," she says, "and that sparked my interest. It wasn't just a hobby, I really wanted to do this."

When she was in Grade 12, Waiser transferred to Canterbury Arts High School, to focus on her acting.

During her final year in high school she got a part in a Mirvish production and moved to Toronto where her career took off.

Despite her success, Waiser had been trying to land the role of Little Sally for more than three years. "I went down to New York and I knew an agent there. A week later, there was a call for Urinetown."

Waiser made it to the final audition, where she and one other actress were left, but she didn't get the role. Six months later, she was called to audition for Little Sally as part of the National Touring Company and was again passed over in the final callbacks.

It was only a matter of time until Urinetown came to Toronto. "I was working at a different theatre company at the time when I found out Urinetown was coming here. The team from Broadway was coming to Toronto, and I thought, 'That's great, but will they remember me?'"

Waiser had in fact made an impression on the Broadway casting agents, who told her just to come to the final callback. The morning after her audition, she heard she got the part.

Urinetown is a quirky comedy revolving around a small town where residents have to pay to use the bathroom. Most citizens are forced to live in poverty because a money-hungry CEO controls bathroom prices and has his hand in the politicians' pockets. It doesn't take long before the citizens plan a revolt, with Little Sally emerging as one of the play's narrators, talking to the audience between scenes.

The musical, originally at the New York International Fringe Festival, became a Broadway hit, but the play didn't lose its fringe qualities in transition.

"It's very witty and really comedic," says Waiser, who admits that acting in this production has been very different from her past theatre experiences. "You have to have really good timing," she says. "It's really quirky. I haven't done a role like this before, but it's something I've wanted to try for a long time."

The Toronto production's creative team, including John Rando, the Tony Award-winning director, have all worked on the Broadway production of the play.

Waiser says her experience working with Rando was invaluable. "It was great. A lot of directors are not actor-directors. They say something and you don't know what they want. [Rando] knows exactly what to say, and if you did something he didn't like, you wouldn't even know it cause he's so confident in the play."

Waiser is getting positive reviews for her role as the bouncy child whose relationship with the police helps her find out information that other characters don't have. But Little Sally isn't Waiser's first role where she's received rave reviews. She was a Dora Award nominee for best performance by a female in Boy Jones.

She did not win, but she says she was pleased by the nomination. "I thought it was a joke. The agency called me, and I said, 'Don't joke about that.' That's something you aspire to when you're 50. It was really an honour."

Urinetown is playing at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts and is scheduled to run until Labour Day.

Tickets are available in person at the CanStage Customer Service Centres, 26 Berkeley St. or 27 Front St. E., by telephone at CanStage 416-368-3110, or at Ticketmaster 416-872-1111 or online at www.canstage.com.

MICHAEL RUBINOFF PRODUCTIONS BRINGS NEW YORK'S GAME SHOW TO ST. LAWRENCE CENTRE

Toronto theatrical entrepreneur Michael Rubinoff, in association with Jeffrey Finn Productions, presents the Toronto premiere of Game Show, a theatrical comedy that the New York Times described as "a cross between a quiz program and Survivor with more plot twists than you'll see in a year of soaps."

Set during a simulated live broadcast of a fictional, long-running TV game show, Game Show places the theatre audience in the role of TV studio audience. Volunteers are selected from the audience to play the trivia-based game and win actual prizes.

In addition to watching and playing, the audience also witnesses all the back-stabbing antics behind the scenes during commercial breaks. The production converts the entire theatre into a television studio equipped with applause signs, contestant podiums and operational television cameras.

Previews begin Thursday, June 24, opens July 7, 8 p.m. Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre. 27 Front St. E. $40. 416-366-7723. www.stlc.com.

Fringe Festival Offerings: The 16th annual Fringe Festival presents productions by about 130 independent theatre companies from across Canada and around the world, performing more than 900 shows in 10 venues from roughly June 30 to July 11. Tickets are usually $8 to $10. Several productions are described below. For more information, contact the Fringe hotline, 416-966-1062.

• Shprinza Productions presents Barely Surviving My Jewish Family, a one-person, autobiographical show in which Sari Colt shares her outrageous tales of growing up in an offbeat Jewish family. Factory Studio Theatre, 125 Bathurst St.

• Australian comic Jonno Katz presents Cactus, an absurd, anarchic solo show in which three characters walk through a desert encountering their dreams, flashbacks and fantasies. Robert Gill Theatre, 214 College St. www.epicworlds.com.

• Fable: Based on a True Story is directed by Jen Johnson and written and performed by Adam Lazarus. This piece of "Bouffon" comic theatre is presented by Schmigeggy. Tarragon Extra Space.

• A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to Decorum is a new, one-man comedy show by Jeff Wener, a former North York box-office worker who "has probably sold more tickets than anyone in Canadian theatre." Royal St. George Theatre, 120 Howland Ave., 416-423-2540.

• Magda's Beauty Secrets, a play by Diane Forrest starring Corinne Conley, tells the story of a Polish girl who is kidnapped to work as a slave labourer in Hitler's Germany. Tarragon Extra Space.

• Applications for the Fringe's 6th annual 24-Hour Playwriting Contest are now being accepted with the contest fee of $25. On Wednesday, June 30, at 7 p.m., 60 contestants will be given four objects, locations or situations to incorporate into their plays, which must be written within 24 hours. Top three prizes are $500, $300 and $150. 416-966-1062, e-mail fringe@fringetoronto. com.

Billy Crystal's new book was inspired by his grandchild

By SORIYA DANIELS
Special to The CJN

The recent birth of his first grandchild has been Billy Crystal's greatest source of joy and inspiration.

So much so that the award-winning actor, director, comedian and Oscar host decided to create a picture book that children, parents and grandparents could enjoy together, while celebrating the continuity of their lineage.

Crystal's book, I Already Know I Love You (HarperCollins) is more than a tale of unconditional love. In a heart-warming way, it imparts some of the Jewish values that have been passed on from Crystal's own parents and grandparents.

"I want to teach you about our family with pictures from long ago," wrote Crystal in his children's book.

Crystal is up to date on his Jewish heritage, as Janice, his wife of more than 30 years, recently hired New York-based genealogist Rafael Gruber to explore his ancestry.

That inspired Crystal and his wife to produce a permanent exhibit,"Finding Our Families, Finding Ourselves," at the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles.

For Crystal, the continuation of the Jewish people is a priority. "You're the new twig on our tree and I can't wait to watch you grow," he wrote to his granddaughter, Ella, in his book, long before he knew his grandchild would be a girl.

"I wrote that I don't know if I'm buying ballet shoes or hockey skates," he says. "I think that line summed it up."

News of impending grandfatherhood came on the first anniversary of his mother's death, which had been a traumatic loss for the Crystal clan. The good news of a grandchild on the way helped propel Crystal out of the sadness over his mother's death.

"The baby has filled up a great place for me that had been sad for a couple of years now because of the loss of my mom," he says. "When you see how life works – someone has to leave to make room for the new – it changes your whole point of view about life. I've been smiling ever since."

Billy Crystal imparts Jewish values to his grandchildren.

To Crystal, having a grandchild reaffirms the continuity of his own family. And not surprisingly, his daughter, Jenny, and son-in-law, Mike, named their daughter Ella Ryan, after Crystal's mother, Helen Eleanor.

The quintessential Jewish comedian, Crystal was close to his grandparents as a child growing up in Brooklyn and then Long Beach, N.Y. He believes that the older generation has a lot to offer children.

"It's important to understand that grandparents were here first and someone was here before them," he says. "I grew up in a house where a grandfather would greet you every day with 'whatta ya gonna do with your life?'"

Crystal has certainly done a lot with his life and he gives credit to his Jewish upbringing on Long Island, and in particular, to his own grandfather, who was a Yiddish actor. "If it wasn't for the laughs and love of my relatives and friends when I was a little kid, I don't think I would have ended up being a comedian."

With the publication of his new children's book, Crystal's career has suddenly taken another direction. "I'm just incredibly moved about this whole new period of my life," says the star of City Slickers and When Harry Met Sally, with an air of comfort associated with his current stage of life.

In his new role as a grandfather, Crystal has been examining his own values. He stresses the importance of honesty.

"I want to show you that lying is never as good as true," he wrote in his book.

Crystal also emphasizes the importance of being actively involved in bringing up children. He foresees helping his granddaughter study for tests and showing her how to fly a kite, and just doing the simple things that make a child happy. "The most important thing is to be with your kids, listen to them, and love them."

Sound like a typical Jewish parent?

CORRECTIONS

The Party Planner (CJN, June 10, Section B) contained the following errors:

• Wisteria Floral Design (905-763-1700) was left out of the list of advertising florists in the story, "Beautiful flowers create simplistic elegance" (page B12).

In the same story, Joanne Winkelaar's name (of Stemz, 416-471-4945) was incorrectly spelled. A statement was also wrongly attributed to her, suggesting that 10 per cent of the party budget should be spent on flowers. She meant 10 per cent of the table budget (including linens, cutlery, etc.).

• The name of Peter Eliopoulos (of By Peter & Pauls, 905-326-2000) was incorrectly spelled in the story, "What's the key to choosing a venue?"(page B13).

• The phone number of S.T. Spa (416-789-9835) was listed incorrectly in the story, "Look your best on your special day" (Page B31).

• Party Outfitters should have been listed in the "Other Advertisers" section of the One Stop Party Shop story (page B8), not of the story on Party Favours (page B6).The phone number of Party Outfitters (905-482-9285) was incorrectly listed.

The CJN regrets the errors.

Resort shows off its magnificence

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Sometimes, as they say in the art world, less is more.

That's the case with the 64-room Vitalis Spa, adjacent to the Herods Palace Hotel and the Herods Forum Convention Center in Eilat, Israel.

Guests at the Vitalis Spa are offered a healthy, relaxed atmosphere with "no smoking, no telephones and no children," according to builder and co-owner Yoav Igra.

"It's a quiet spa environment," said Igra, who was part of a delegation from the Herods Complex to visit Toronto recently. "It's very hard for Israeli people not to have their telephone ringing, but we overcome it."

But the Vitalis, which at 3,500 sq. metres is billed as the largest spa in Israel, also offers a constellation of features that place it among the best spas in the world.

While telephones are available for those who can't part from them, all guests have access to a superbly equipped fitness centre, dry and wet saunas, outdoor aerobic deck, hydromassage treatment pool and other state-of-the-art spa facilities, all against a backdrop of the sea and the mountains.

As with the rest of the complex, the design highlights the region's history with artistic themes and emblems borrowed from the Greeks, Romans, Nabateans and Egyptians.

Guests can enjoy the state-of-the-art spa facilities. [IGTO photo]

"Most hotels create boxes that look like office buildings," Igra said. "We wanted to create a different effect."

Situated along Eilat's beach-front promenade, the Herods Palace complex has received international accolades since opening several years ago. The Jerusalem Post called it "a sprawling expanse of artfully crafted turquoise and white buildings, pools, pergolas, gazebos, bridges, domes and amphitheaters."

While the Vitalis Spa is for adults only, the adjacent Herods Palace welcomes family members of all ages.

Moshe Sand, general manager of Herods Palace Hotel, was part of the delegation to show off the three-part resort to dozens of tourism professionals at Toronto's Sheraton Centre Hotel in late May. The promotional event featured a lavish kosher spread, live band and audiovisual presentation.

"Why is it that Greece has 20 million tourists each year and Israel only gets two or three million?" said Sand. "This bothers me. Israel has so much to offer. It's the cradle of civilization.

"One day there will be peace – or at least quiet," he continued. "And it will attract many millions of tourists to Israel."

Book describes poet's journey into her family's past

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Despite its title, How to Tell Your Children about the Holocaust (McGilligan Books), Ruth Mandel's work is not a how-to manual about Holocaust education nor an easy-to-read children's genocide tale.

It is a book of poetry, divided into three parts, that describes Mandel's 12-year journey into her family's past through her father's Holocaust experience.

Ruth Mandel

"It is a sampler that deals with the many different issues that come up around the Holocaust," Mandel says in an interview.

Mandel, who recently won the Isaac Frischwasser Memorial Award for Holocaust Literature at the Canadian Jewish Book Awards, began her exploration after she asked her father "what happened to you in the Holocaust?" and was met with a wall of silence.

It's not that she didn't know about Hitler's Final Solution and the European Jewish experience. In fact, the primary part of her Jewish identity revolved around the Holocaust and formed the lens through which she viewed everything around her.

And so she writes, "The Shoah is the bottle in which we are held."

But her father's determination not to discuss his own personal experiences led Ruth to question the boundaries through which identities are formed, and to investigate what it means when people are so "wounded by prejudice" that past abuses inform their present so completely.

"By labelling himself a survivor, my dad let the Holocaust define himself in a way that kept injuring him over and over again," Mandel says.

Mandel believes her father's experience is written into people every time they are wounded, and she emphasizes that genocide and war crimes are not singular experiences limited to the Jewish people.

"My writing is about trying not to devalue the fight against any form of prejudice and, of course, the obvious obligation of anyone who has suffered so, not to recreate that for somebody else," Mandel says.

"Who could know better than we not to devalue lives, not to be prejudiced? Who could be more compelled toward empathy and compassion and who would want security and levity for all?" she queries.

Mandel suggests her parents coped with their experiences by separating themselves from the "religiosity of Jewishness." The family grew up in the Yonge-Eglinton area of Toronto and Ruth really didn't know many other Jews, besides "our neighbour and relatives.

"Having the Holocaust form the primary part of my identity as a Jew was a very lonely kind of a way to be Jewish," she admits.

As she grew up, she began to wonder "where the fun part was? Where is the part that I can take for my own?"

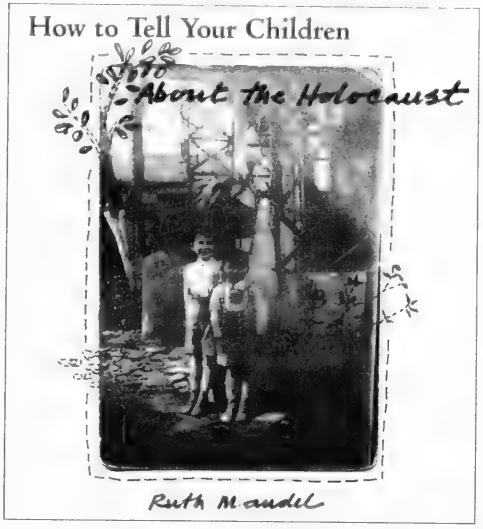
Initially, she joined the Jewish Feminist anti-Fascist League, a group of very young, political, community active, diverse, Jewish women. In 1994, they organized "Carrying our Memories Forward – an Evening of Resistance and Survival in commemoration of the 51st anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising".

"My first Jewish friends were in that group," Ruth says.

Mandel recalls she also took classes with Rabbi Elysse Goldstein. "Learning with her allowed me to study in a context where someone else had done the scholarship, the deconstruction, the interpretation and I could just absorb."

Now, Mandel writes Passover Haggadahs for her children – Ziva, 8, and Tai'o, 2, – that change every few years to include popular melodies her children relate to. Last year's seder incorporated tunes by Britney Spears and The Spice Girls.

"We do matzah bakes on the street and include all our neighbours," says Mandel, who now lives in the Bathurst-Bloor neighbourhood, just down the street from where her mother grew up. Mandel's daughter goes to the same Palmerston Avenue public school her mother attended.



While she intends to set up an after-school Jewish program for her kids, Mandel says she is also committed to diversity and mixing.

"I'm adverse to isolation and exclusion," she says.

Mandel, who describes herself as a poet and textile artist, has a degree in communications from Concordia University and has worked in the feature and documentary film industry in various positions, including researcher, production co-ordinator and location manager.

Over the past 10 years, her poetry has been included in various literary journals and anthologies, including Never Again, A History of the Holocaust, by Sir Martin Gilbert.

In the introduction of How To Tell Your Children About The Holocaust, Gilbert, an Oxford professor and the official biographer of Winston Churchill, recalls that he lived with Mandel's maternal grandparents as a wartime child evacuee from Britain.

Gilbert notes that Mandel represents that "articulate voice of the 'second generation' – the children of survivors."

It is a voice that attempts to integrate a devastating family past into her current reality by disclosing and engaging with the implications of the Holocaust on her own life.

As Mandel writes in "How To Tell your Children About the Holocaust," the title poem for which the book is named, "Personal history arrives of its own volition, no consent no map no help no tricks.

"You are merely here to explain it."

Maple Downs to celebrate 50th anniversary in July

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Maple Downs officials participate in the official ribbon-cutting ceremony to open the expanded premises. Seen here, from left: David Greaves, Ian Roher, Allan Baker, Marilyn Levenstein and Harvey Capp.

In 1954, religious discrimination in Toronto was still very much a reality. Private institutions, including golf clubs, were restricted. The message was clear, if not explicit: Jews need not apply.

For those who wanted to enjoy the golf experience, options were limited. Oakdale was already in existence, but even then the club imposed membership fees that were far too rich for the average golfer.

Faced with limited options, a group of entrepreneurial-minded friends decided to create their own alternative: Why not create a new Jewish club, the second in the city?

That year, Maple Downs Golf and Country Club opened for business on what used to be a remote patch of scrub bush on Dufferin Street north of Major Mackenzie in the town of Maple. Next month, it will celebrate its 50th anniversary with a dinner and dance for current and past members. The recently renovated clubhouse will serve as the showcase for the club's rich past. Inside, a continuous loop slide show of archival photos, as well as a display of historic pictures and gatherings of old and new members, will recall the club's storied past.

David Greaves, Maple Downs' general manager, said the club is hoping the anniversary will facilitate the transmission of the club's rich heritage to a new generation of golfers.

Country club atmosphere, but with a Jewish flavour

Mickey Firestone, 86, is one of the remaining original members who is able to recount the club's challenging early days. Back in 1954, he recalled, the late Murray Ehrlich and Normy Bornstein became aware that a 156-acre piece of land was for sale. At $105,000, the price was right. An eight-man committee assembled to explore the possibility of purchasing it, and when news spread about the venture, the committee grew to 30 or more – "99 per cent weren't even golfers" – Firestone said.

The group called a public meeting at the Engineers Club on Spadina, north of College to invite potential members to invest in the club. "Murray made the pitch and spoke like we knew what we were talking about," Firestone recalled.

Sold on the idea of an affordable Jewish golf club, participants forked over 168 cheques for $500 each. The Mitchell Brothers were hired as the course architects, and $10,000 was spent on seedlings, which were planted by kids. When they started, "it was the most barren piece of land you could imagine," Firestone said.

When the course opened, there were only 12 holes, a pro shop, and nothing else, he added.

In 1955, Hurricane Hazel ripped up most of the club's top soil, but Maple Downs persevered. The club hired a pro, George Clifton, and he in turn signed Irv Lightstone as an assistant. Lightstone, an accomplished golfer who would go on to play for a short time on the PGA Tour, served as assistant for about seven years before taking over the reins as head man.

Under Lightstone's influence, the club made tremendous strides in making itself a popular and highly sought-after destination. In the late 1980s, the club hosted a unique event that was sponsored by IMASCO as a pre-Canadian Open fun day. PGA tour players showed off their skills, including Greg Norman, Jack Nicklaus, Nick Price, Lee Trevino, Curtis Strange, Craig Stadler and Peter Jacobsen.

As the club continued to develop, it expanded to a 6,700-yard, 18 hole course that featured a forested layout and difficult holes with few flat lies. In 1996, the course was recognized by the golf experts at Score Magazine, Canada's golfing bible, as the 32nd best in the country.

Maple Downs was never an easy course to play, Firestone recalled. Golfers with handicaps of six or eight strokes "thought themselves lucky to get 85 or 90."

The club did produce one top player about 30 years ago, Norm Mogil, who won the Canadian junior championship.

Today, the club maintains a junior program for kids under 16, but no one has come close to duplicating Mogil's success. Instead, Maple Downs stresses the recreational and social aspects of golf and is striving to maintain a membership number that will make the club a going concern for years to come.

Today, there are slightly fewer than 300 male "senior" members and a further 185 female members. Juniors add another 100 players.

Maple Downs continues to attract young families who enjoy golf and the atmosphere created by a Jewish club, said Greaves. New members pony up an initiation fee of $55,000, spread over six or seven years, while weekend memberships go for $30,000. Annual dues run at $5,700 per year with a $1,000 food minimum per family.

Maple Downs offers a country club atmosphere, but with a Jewish flavour, Baker said. Every Friday night, a traditional dinner is served in the clubhouse, and with the recent renovation and addition, creating an 18,000-square foot facility, members have a very comfortable club to enjoy, he added.

The club maintains a close association with State of Israel Bonds and has raised money for Bonds for 20 years. As well, each August, the club hosts guests from the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, who are treated to lunch and entertainment. The club also opens its doors to participants in Baycrest's annual bikeathon, providing a stop en route for lunch.

Each Sunday is the club's fun family day, with a barbecue and buffet, kids swimming or playing on the club's four tennis courts and practice available on the club's four-acre area devoted to the short game.

The challenge of finding kosher products

It has been six months since I koshered my kitchen, and I am finally a kosher guru. However, it didn't start out that way.

My first experience shopping for kosher food was a full-day, traumatic event. I took little breaks in between walking down the food aisles because I was so confused. I used to be in and out of the grocery store in half an hour. I knew what products were vegetarian, which were organic and what my favourites were.

But when I became kosher, the dairy section made me dizzy. I couldn't find the hechsher on my favourite yogurt and had to purchase a new brand. There was no hard kosher cheddar cheese anywhere. I was almost in tears after going to three different stores trying to find kosher milk. After drinking black coffee for days, I learned from my rabbi that unless I was cholov Yisrael observant, milk didn't need a hechsher.

Next I became convinced in the cereal aisle that corn flakes are not kosher. I thought, "I should tell my Orthodox friends to stop eating it." Before I made a total fool of myself, I found the small COR on the box. It had an almost-hidden hechsher! Why was it so small? The manufacturer should make it bigger. I am sure sales would go up.

If I lived in a religious neighbourhood, it would have been easier to purchase kosher products. But I am always up for a challenge and I don't have a car, so I decided to continue scouting out my local stores for kosher food.

To my complete disappointment, there was no kosher bread within walking distance. Despite the latest health fad, I still eat carbohydrates. I did find kosher bagels at the local Dominion, and kosher pita is available. Pita is fun for awhile, but then it gets boring – and it is very difficult to toast.

Sometimes, I plan a field trip and take the bus to the big Dominion at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue, which has an abundance of kosher products. This Dominion also has a great selection of cheese and a full aisle of kosher food. Subsequently, I go to a nearby coffeeshop for a coffee and a great tasting kosher muffin. The staff always serves me with a smile and it is a great place to schmooze.

By far my most entertaining grocery shopping experience was at Sobey's in Thornhill the weekend before Passover. (Also the most expensive.) In every aisle, there was someone I knew from various aspects of my life – shul acquaintances, work colleagues, guys I have been on dates with and friends I have not seen in years. The coffee section was confusing, so I asked a young religious couple which brands were kosher for Passover. We became friends and they invited me over for a future Shabbat meal. It was a big kosher grocery party! I could have spent all day there, but my frozen food was melting.

I have since graduated and am no longer the naïve kosher shopper. After receiving e-mail support and encouraging advice from readers, I realized I was not alone.

I read Is It Kosher? by E. Eidlitz and found it to be very helpful. The Kashruth Council of Canada has an informative website, whether you are just getting started or want to research a particular food item. I learned if you are a patient grocery shopper, sooner or later, you will find the small hidden hechsher. And if you don't, there are plenty of other kosher products to choose from.

DARK CHOCOLATE OATMEAL COOKIES

- 3/4 cups all purpose flour
- 3/4 cups unsweetened cocoa powder
- 1/2 tsp. baking soda
- 3/4 tsp. salt
- 1 stick unsalted butter, room temperature
- 1/2 cup sugar
- 1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
- 2 tblsp. rolled oats (not instant)
- 3/4 cup semisweet chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350°F. Butter large rimmed baking sheet. Sift first 4 ingredients into medium bowl. Using electric mixer, beat butter in large bowl until fluffy. Add sugar and vanilla; beat until blended. Add flour mixture and beat until moist clumps form. Mix in oats with spatula until evenly distributed (dough will be very firm). Add chocolate chips and knead gently to blend.

Using moistened palms, shape 1 generous tablespoon dough into ball. Place on prepared sheet; flatten to 2-inch round. Repeat with remaining dough, spacing rounds about 2 inches apart.

Bake cookies until centre is slightly firm and top is cracked, about 14 minutes. Cool on sheet.

Epi on Education

In the federal election campaign currently underway, there are, of course, issues that directly or indirectly affect Jewish voters. I will not use this column to offer any opinions as to which party would be best for Jews. In fact, there are facets of each party platform that jibe with one Jewish value or another, and my strength has never been in politics.

There is, however, something common to all the party leaders that should speak to us as Jews. I was singularly impressed by the ability of all four politicians in question to speak a second language, indeed to debate forcefully in a language other than their native tongue. For the average European politician, this would not be so rare, but even in Europe, many political leaders are limited to one language of fluency. To our immediate south in the United States, it is very rare to find politicians who can flip back and forth linguistically (and as a consequence, culturally).

The advantages of such flexibility are obvious but overlooked when Jews consider their own cultural heritage.

Knowing Hebrew doesn't link us only to another language, but to the full richness of our classical texts and values of the past. It also provides a live connection to the current culture of the modern Israeli state.

This is why our schools put so much stress on Hebrew language and literature. To truly know the beauty of our past and, more importantly, to be a creative partner in the building of our future, we must be able to read, speak and sing from right to left. Even the letters of the Hebrew alphabet (itself a Hebrew word that we lent to others!) have poetry hidden in their curves that slowly reveals itself to the avid student.

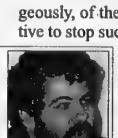
Our ancestors in places as distant from each other as Poland and North Africa would put honey on Hebrew play objects so that infants would learn the sweetness of their heritage. Perhaps we need to give our children Hebrew-English keyboards on their first computers so that they learn early to be comfortable with a language that empowers them to link our glorious past with a flourishing Jewish future.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The trouble with 'never again'

I think something is missing in Holocaust education.

One of the fundamental teachings in Holocaust education is the message of "never again" – the idea that Jews will not be silent or inactive when genocide is perpetrated in the world, knowing the terror we experienced at the hands of the Nazis.



We produce feature films, books and lecture series on every aspect of the Holocaust, reminding ourselves that we were demonized as worms and insects and that our parents were forced to kick the streets of Europe. We teach the concept of "never again" to our teenagers by showing them the remains of hair belonging to Jews, within the barbed fences of Auschwitz and other embodiments of evil.

The Toronto Jewish community, with the rest of the Jewish world, has spent millions of dollars on museum exhibitions showing actual cattle cars and yellow stars worn by our daughters who were forced by the Nazis to prostitute themselves.

Over and over, survivors remind us, so courageously, of their humiliation and the imperative to stop such barbarism from reoccurring. Never again.

"Never again" is repeated on Yom Hashoah, as we march along the train tracks of concentration camps, draped in Israeli flags, and when we celebrate the courage of the Elie Wiesels and Simon Wiesenthals.

These are all commanding reminders of the Holocaust, constructed, in part, to encourage brave responses to humankind should it transmute into a physical wretch void of soul. "Never again" is a code that lies deeply within the Jewish mind.

Despite our thorough education, however, a disconnect occurs in many Jews when they are actually faced with the prospect of "never again" – such as in Cambodia, Rwanda, or today, Sudan. So often this phrase flails at our feet like a fish gasping for life. How is this?

What indeed is the intellectual, emotional and spiritual progression that happens within us as we heed the testimony of people like Roméo Dallaire, the Canadian general responsible for UN peace-keeping forces in Rwanda in 1994, who refused to leave the country despite a command to do so and the utter indifference of the world?

We listen intently, sigh and celebrate his valour and commitment to "never again," but know in our hearts that the Jewish world, for the most part, stood by during the Rwandan genocide, as our non-Jewish counterparts did during the Holocaust. We could have collectively, and fiercely demanded action from our government and the world. We have the ability to do so. But we didn't. Why?

Today, it is clear the Sudanese people are being enslaved, murdered and ethnically cleansed. Two million are affected. Two million! Some Jews are responding – for example, a local doctor, Norman Epstein, and his committee – but most of us are not.

What then are we thinking when we listen to another Holocaust lecturer, as she bangs her fist on the lectern and shouts, "Never again." What are we processing?

I do not ask this painful question to condemn us for not caring – I know better of our people – but rather to encourage careful consideration of this serious disconnect: an aspect of Holocaust education demands our commitment to act, yet we are silent when genocides stare at us.

How do we ensure that "never again" will be a shofar-like awakening to arouse the brave, rescue God's creation and set a valiant example to the deafening disinterest of the world who watched while six million of our people were slaughtered?

We need to figure this one out. This is one of the troubles of Judaism today. Never again!

Remembering Theodor Herzl on his 100th yahrzeit

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

The foremost event in modern Jewish history was the establishment of the State of Israel, Friday, May 14, 1948. The scene depicting the proclamation is familiar to every Jew, and very prominent is the image of Theodor Herzl, towering over the proceedings from his impressive portrait high on the wall.

Herzl, whose 100th yahrzeit falls this year on the 20th of Tammuz (July 9), was not the first to espouse Zionism. Several writers, including Yehuda Alkalai in 1839 and Leo Pinsker in 1882, promulgated ideas that would later be identified as Zionist. And the Chovevei Tzion movement began establishing agricultural settlements in Palestine 12 years before Herzl adopted Zionism. But none before Herzl came anywhere close to creating the machinery that would lead to statehood.

Herzl was born in Budapest in 1860, and his family moved to Vienna when he was 18. He and his family were assimilated to the extent that Judaism played only a minor role in their lives, as was then typical among the non-observant affluent families in the larger cities of Central Europe.

Theodor Herzl

Ignited the souls of so many others

Editorial

Theodor Herzl's deeply set, dark brown eyes were said by a biographer to have "shone with an inner light of their own and to have exercised a strange fascination over those upon whom they fell."

That description, undoubtedly, owed as much to a biographer's zeal as it did to historical truth. But no one could deny the force of the fixed, penetrating gaze that emanated from Herzl's eyes like a harder-than-rock bit of diamond drilling through stone. Those eyes – and the determined, dreamy, courageous personality they bespoke – became the defining feature of the man who, by dint of sheer personal will and strength of character, altered the course of modern Jewish – and one might add, world – history.

Next week, on the 20th day of Tammuz, (July 9), we will commemorate Theodor Herzl's 100th yahrzeit.

Like all great men of history, Herzl was an imperfect man who judged and misjudged events and people with straining human fallibility.

But like all other great men of history, he would not be moved, despite the odds, from the single-minded cause that had ignited his soul and by which, in turn, he ignited the souls of so many others – the urgent founding of a modern state for the Jewish people.

Theodor Herzl was the father of the modern Zionist movement. He, more than any other, gathered up, shaped and channelled millennial, messianic, theological yearnings of Return to Zion into a modern political movement.

New Mayor Jewish

WINNIPEG — Businessman Sam Katz became Winnipeg's first-ever Jewish mayor last week, trouncing a crowded field of candidates for the job vacated by federal Liberal candidate Glen Murray. Katz, 53, won 42 per cent of votes cast, 43,000 more than his nearest rival, former city councillor and boxer Dan Vandal. Katz is a concert promoter and owner of the Winnipeg Goldeyes minor league baseball team.

Veteran Journalist Dies

TORONTO — Former Toronto Sun journalist Jerry Gladman died last week of Lou Gehrig's disease at age 61. The columnist and feature writer was diagnosed with the debilitating neurological ailment, also called amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS, in late 2003. In his more than 40-year career, he also worked at the defunct Toronto Telegram and as a journalism instructor at Ryerson Polytechnic University. He leaves his wife, three children and four grandchildren. Last fall, he wrote about life with ALS in an award-winning four-part series in the Sun.

Mizrachi Scholarships

TORONTO — Mizrachi Canada announced it has awarded more than $42,000 in scholarships, ranging from $250 to $2,500, to Toronto high- school graduates to help them finance a year of study at yeshivot and midrashot in Israel. Mizarachi said its Montreal office will hand out more awards there later this month. Mizrachi received more than 70 aid requests and gave grants to students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Ulpanat Orot, Tiferes Bais Yaakov, Bnos Bais Yaakov, Ner Israel Yeshiva and a number of public high schools.

World

No Christian Reference

BRUSSELS — The European Union Constitution will not contain a reference to Christianity. EU leaders meeting June 18 left untouched the draft preamble of the constitution, which recognizes Europe's "cultural, religious and humanist heritage," despite calls from some countries to include a reference to Christianity. The move was strongly criticized by Pope John Paul II.

Lineups For the Rebbe

NEW YORK — Thousands gathered last week to mark the 10th anniversary of the Lubavitcher rebbe's death. Some waited for hours to enter the Queens cemetery where Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson is buried. He is credited with turning Chabad-Lubavitch into one of the most prominent public faces of Judaism.

Zionists Blamed

RIYADH — Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah blamed Israel for the recent execution in Saudi Arabia of U.S. defence contractor Paul Johnson. "Zionism is behind it," Abdullah told Saudi TV. "It is not 100 per cent, but 95 per cent that the Zionist hands are behind what happened." Johnson was beheaded by Islamic terrorists.

Buildings Attacked

LONDON — A London Jewish communal building was firebombed less than 24 hours after a separate attack on a London synagogue. The offices of the outreach organization Aish HaTorah were gutted by fire the evening of June 18 and two Torah scrolls in the centre's synagogue were torn and desecrated. Jewish security and police sources say no one has claimed responsibility for the attack, which is not believed to be connected to an arson attack the day before at London's South Tottenham Synagogue.

Jewish Artifacts Found

WARSAW — Archeologists unearthed a trove of Jewish ritual objects buried since the Holocaust near the former Auschwitz death camp. The items, including candlesticks and chanukiyot, were found during an excavation of the foundations of the destroyed Great Synagogue in Oswiecim, the town near the camp. The shul was burned to the ground in 1939 after the Nazis invaded Poland. Funded by Polish and Israeli sources and the Claims Conference, and filmed for Israeli TV, the dig started May 31. The only clue where to dig came from an elderly Holocaust survivor who saw the shul caretaker bury a large box near the building shortly after the Nazis invaded Poland in 1939.

Métis Leader Apologizes For Hitler Comments

WINNIPEG — Manitoba Métis Federation president David Chartrand apologized last week for comparing Conservative party campaign manager and University of Calgary political science professor Tom Flanagan to Adolf Hitler.

The comments came at a news conference where Chartrand and Dennis White Bird, grand chief of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs, announced their support for the Liberals.

Chartrand accused the Tories of having a hidden agenda on aboriginal rights and pointed to Flanagan, who wrote a book four years ago called First Nations? Second Thoughts, in which he argued there is a need "to minimize the damage caused by the thoughtless elevation of the Métis to the status of a distinct 'aboriginal' people."

Chartrand said that "when people talk about Hitler, they see such hatred, that a man could be so cruel. You look at Thomas Flanagan writing about us, saying that we shouldn't even exist, that we're not even a people." Asked if he was comparing Flanagan to Hitler, Chartrand replied: "If Flanagan had his way, if he had an army behind him, yes I would."

Speaking a day later to CBC, he said he wanted "to apologize to all those who were affected by Hitler," but added he he would "fight to protect my people."

Assembly of First Nations national chief Phil Fontaine said although Flanagan's writings are "racist," Chartrand's comments were "extreme and beyond the pale" and "offensive to the Jewish community… and all Canadians."

Senator sees breakthrough on anti-Semitism at UN

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two years ago, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), a 55-member group representing much of the developed world, issued a clear and ringing denunciation of anti-Semitism. At its conference in Berlin, OSCE member states pledged to combat the hatred of Jews, enact legislation to punish it and educate its citizens about it.

Senator Jerry Grafstein, OSCE treasurer and head of the organization's liberal, democratic/reform group, believes the OSCE declaration is bearing fruit.

In what Grafstein describes as a "breakthrough" and "a major victory at the United Nations," UN Secretary General Kofi Annan has condemned anti-Semitism while acknowledging the OSCE led the way in addressing the issue.

"In effect, a junior organization… has influenced the UN," Grafstein said. "The OSCE has deeply influenced the UN to take on anti-Semitism."

Annan's remarks were delivered in an opening statement at a one-day UN seminar on anti-Semitism held in New York last week.

"The rise of anti-Semitism anywhere is a threat to people everywhere. Thus, in fighting anti-Semitism we fight for the future of all humanity," the secretary general said.

Pointing to the 1975 UN resolution equating Zionism with racism, Annan said "the UN's record on anti-Semitism has at times fallen short of our ideals."

Furthermore, he said, "when we seek justice for the Palestinian – as we must – let us firmly disavow anyone who tries to use that cause to incite hatred against Jews, in Israel or elsewhere."

Annan went on to commend the OSCE's view that "international developments on political issues, including those in Israel or elsewhere in the Middle East, never justify anti-Semitism."

Grafstein said the OSCE will continue its aggressive offensive against anti-Semitism at its next meeting in Edinburgh from July 5 to July 10. A new resolution, presented by U.S. delegate Christopher Smith and seconded by Grafstein, will build on the Berlin Declaration and develop a concrete plan of action

The resolution, in part, calls on member states to gather information on anti-Semitic hate crimes; hold hearings to ensure each country's commitment to the Berlin principles are implemented; and create mechanisms to educate and train educators, military forces, law enforcement and judicial officers about anti-Semitism, intolerance and the Holocaust.

Grafstein said he convinced, with some difficulty, the Senate to study anti-Semitism in Canada. The Senate's standing committee on human rights began its investigation on April 19, but no parallel inquiry has been scheduled by the House of Commons, he said.

At the UN, meanwhile, the international organization came under fire from law professor Anne Bayefsky last week for not only failing to address anti-Semitism, but for becoming "the leading global purveyor of anti-Semitism – intolerance and inequality against the Jewish people and its state."

In remarks reprinted in The Wall Street Journal, Bayefsky blasted the UN for "demonizing" Israel and for failing to craft a specific resolution or a single report on anti-Semitism, "in contrast to annual resolutions and reports focusing on the defamation of Islam and discrimination against Muslims and Arabs. Instead there was Durban, the 2001 UN World Conference 'Against Racism' which was a breeding ground and global soapbox for anti-Semites."

Bayefsky noted that Annan condemned Israel's "extrajudicial killing" of Hamas terrorist Abdel Aziz Rantisi, but remained silent when the UN special rapporteur detailed the murder of more than 3,000 Brazilian civilians. "That's discrimination," she said.

Bayefsky said if the UN was serious about eradicating anti-Semitism, it should "start putting a name to the terrorists that kill Jews because they are Jews. Start condemning human rights violators where they dwell, even if they live in Riyadh or Damascus. Stop condemning the Jewish people for fighting back against their killers… Only then will the message be heard from these chambers that the UN will not tolerate anti-Semitism or its consequences against Jews and the Jewish people, whether its victims live in Tehran, Paris or Jerusalem."

When theatre beckons and dreams come true

Two aspiring actors, Jordan Kanner and Jonathan Gould, are performing, for the first time, at the Stratford Festival this summer. For both, it's a dream come true. And when young people actually live their dreams, it is always a worthwhile story.

Jordan Kanner was born in Montreal some 27 years ago but grew up in Toronto, where his family moved when he was very young.

In an interview last week, Jordan said he took his first drama steps on the stage of North York's Leah Posluns Theatre, where he played acting games when he was five or six years old. As a youngster, his parents enrolled him in various acting and improvisation programs at the Koffler Centre. The sheer fun of those experiences stayed with him and would subsequently steer his career to where it is today.

From the editor's desk

One year ago, Jordan graduated from the fine arts program at Ryerson University. Today, he is performing in two plays at the Stratford Festival, Alexandre Dumas' The Count of Monte Cristo and William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

"It's simply amazing to be here," he said. "I am ecstatic. You never stop learning here. It's great to have this opportunity."

Even though he is only at the beginning of his professional career, he has already played a number of demanding roles. During his graduating year at Ryerson, he performed the role of the emcee in Cabaret.

Some eight months later, he played the role of Neil Rosenbloom in Hate, an episode of the CBC program True Crime 72 Hours. Rosenbloom was a young Toronto rabbinical student who was murdered some years ago in Pittsburgh.

It's very difficult not to notice Jordan. He stands three inches taller than six feet. Jordan loves what he is doing but acknowledges "it is a tough business."

"Especially when you are starting out, you have to close your ears from the things you hear people saying." He quickly adds, however, that from his parents, who are members of the Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto, he heard supporting words of encouragement. And that helped him all along the way. They were the boosters for his career as an actor, which he has now fully launched.

The advice he offers young people trying to follow their own creative dreams is, "If it's what you want to do, then, do it."

Jonathan Gould, 25, actor, musician and songwriter, was born to the theatre. "It was something that just came naturally," he said in an interview.

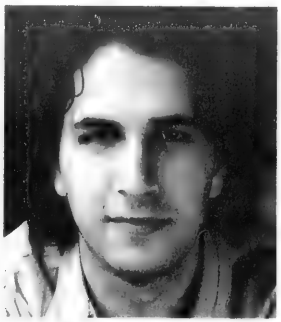
And it is no wonder. His parents established an ambience in their home in Ottawa, a short walk from their shul, Congregation Machzikei Hadas, that nurtured self-confidence and inspired creativity in him and his siblings, and planted acting, singing and dancing within their souls.

"I was three years old and performing," Jonathan said in his deep, baritone voice.

His two older sisters, Jennifer and Adrienne, are accomplished, professional actors in their own right. Indeed, Adrienne is performing at Stratford this season and will join younger brother Jonathan, in the cast of The Count of Monte Cristo.

His affection and respect for his sisters is palpable. "There was never, nor is there today, any competition with my sisters or sibling rivalry," he said.

Jonathan's path to a life in theatre has been quite focused. He left Ottawa after graduating from Canterbury High School for the Performing Arts, to study fine arts at the University of North Carolina. Then, with his degree in hand, he moved to New York for a year of additional training.



Jordan Kanner

Jonathan Gould

"Theatre school was a battle," he said. "You are constantly being scrutinized and judged."

To help him through some of the tougher "battles," he would call home. "My mom was always great when I needed sensitivity and understanding." But he quickly added, "My dad was great, too, but when I needed pragmatic advice."

The combination of his parents' encouragement and advice, his sisters' examples and his own talent and determination have clearly landed Jonathan where he loves being. "I am so grateful that this is what I do for a living. When I wake up each day, I am so happy to say that acting is my thing. I feel rewarded each day I am here," he said.

In addition to a role in The Count of Monte Cristo, Jonathan is part of the cast of the festival's The Triumph of Love.

His advice to youngsters looking for their own career paths was an unrehearsed echo of that of his fellow Stratford apprentice. "Do what's true to you. Try to do what you know you have innate ability to do."

It helps, of course, to grow up in a home that is supportive and nurturing of those abilities while they are still in the growing stage. That, of course, is one of the key messages for parents from the stories of these two young but very talented Stratford apprentices. —MBD

BUILDING TOGETHER: Members of Holy Blossom Temple's young adult group Generation Aleph joined participants from last week's Central Conference of American Rabbis convention and more than 40 others from Holy Blossom and the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism to help build a house in Scarborough with Habitat for Humanity, an organization that erects homes for families who need affordable housing.

Reform rabbis address issues at convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill, the Central Conference of American Rabbis' (CCAR) 115th annual convention last week was an opportunity for learning, fellowship and the exchange of ideas.

Rabbi Gottlieb and about 15 colleagues from Canada were among 450 Reform rabbis who took part in a wide-ranging program at Toronto's Westin Harbour Castle.

Although the vast majority were American, with a handful of Europeans and about a dozen Israelis, Rabbi Michael Stroh of Thornhill's Temple Har Zion said they dealt mainly with "universal rabbinic issues," rather than geographically specific ones.

Both rabbis cited a major session on the Zohar, the central text in Kabbalah, as a highlight. The session featured Daniel Matt and Arthur Green, authors of a new translation of the work. A focus on Kabbalah at a Reform Jewish event is no longer unusual, said Rabbi Stroh.

Among the other major sessions were a panel on the Reform movement in Israel and a wrap-up address by Lutheran theologian Martin Marty, who said there are three main demands in religion: experience, identity and authority.

Liberal religion "has to be more concerned with what is identity and what is experience, and what kind of authority you have when you don't want a legalistic kind of authority along the way," said Marty.

More than 60 workshops were offered, ranging from terrorism to transgender issues and from Kabbalah to synagogue transformation.

A session on adolescent congregational programs, with Sara Lee, director of the Rhea Hirsch School of Education at Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles, was one of the top two sessions for which participants signed up.

"We have to think in radically new ways," said Lee, who cited, among other items, a need for teens themselves to make important decisions in the process of creating an "adolescent community." She proposed a theoretical model that would be relevant and "would provide...a Jewish 'second family,' where [teens] will find comfort and support, will grapple with values, and deal with decisions in an environment of learning and resources."

Representatives of the 1,800-member organization, the largest denominational group of its kind, adopted a resolution on Iraq supporting U.S. President George W. Bush's commitment to assisting in rebuilding a stable country but condemning the Bush administration for "false claims" of weapons of mass destruction to justify the war in Iraq and for failure to implement a plan to end "chaos" in the country.

The rabbis also resolved to oppose any proposed federal or state constitutional amendment that would limit full civil marriage for same-sex couples.

In the four years that the CCAR has recognized the legitimacy of same-sex unions, rabbis say they "have grown in our knowledge and experience of same-gender couples establishing Jewish homes and raising Jewish children."

CCAR president Rabbi Janet Marder expressed pride in the Reform rabbinate for "this courageous stand."

The rabbis also called on Israel to end "discriminatory" demolition of Palestinian homes and to place "limits" on the construction of Israel's security barrier, and passed a resolution supporting dialogue with Arabs and Muslims.

A resolution opposing physician-assisted suicide as public policy was tabled by a vote of 68 to 62.

Judge quashes Zundel's subpoena

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Federal Court judge last week quashed an attempt by Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel to compel officials of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada to testify at his security hearing.

Judge Pierre Blais ruled Zundel failed to show that either Keith Landy, former national president of Congress, or Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith, provided government ministers with any information beyond their public statements urging that Zundel be removed from Canada.

Judge Blais also quashed subpoenas issued against journalist and author Andrew Mitrovica, who wrote a book about the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and Zundel, and Ontario Court Judge Lauren Marshall, who served as legal counsel for Zundel almost 20 years ago.

Congress' and B'nai Brith's efforts were public and "lobbying ministers is a legitimate exercise in an open and democratic society such as Canada. Anyone has the opportunity to lobby any minister at any time and make his or her views known," Judge Blais wrote in an 18-page judgement released last week.

"The CJC and B'nai Brith have been rather vocal about this matter, so there is little to be gained from Mr. Landy's or Mr. Dimant's testimony in this regard. They would not be able to testify as to the true influence the CJC or B'nai Brith may have had on the government, since only the decision-makers… know how the decision was made."

Zundel, one of the world's foremost publishers of neo-Nazi and Holocaust-denial material, has been in jail since he was expelled to Canada from the United States in February 2003. Zundel had left Toronto two years before to join his wife in Tennessee. He was deported to Canada when his U.S. visitor's visa expired.

Federal officials issued a security certificate declaring Zundel a threat to Canada. They are attempting to remove him to his native Germany, where he faces charges of inciting racial hate against Jews. For his part, Zundel has made a refugee claim, though hearings on that are on hold pending a determination of the validity of the security certificate.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Congress' Ontario region, said court dates have already been booked for October and November. "There is no end in sight," he said. "There is motion after motion and appeal after appeal."

Landy said Zundel's attempt to subpoena Jewish leaders is an attempt to show "Jews exercise extraordinary power on elected representatives… The unofficial reason is he wanted to delay and protract the proceedings and to try to create theatre, as has been his wont in the past."

Landy and Farber said that if Zundel had returned to Germany last year, he would probably be a free man today, even if he had to serve a short time in jail.

"I believe he wants to be a martyr for his cause," Farber said. "It seems he has a Christ complex, a messianic martyr's complex where he wants to be seen as a martyr for his movement."

Teen charged with arson in yacht club fire

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A 13-year-old boy turned himself into police last week in connection with the fire that destroyed the clubhouse of the Island Yacht Club (IYC) on Father's Day, June 20.

The youth, who cannot be identified under young offender legislation, was investigated by police at 52 Division and subsequently released. He faces charges of arson – damage to property; mischief endangering life; mischief interfering with property; and mischief over $5,000. He is to appear in court July 30.

Shortly after the blaze was extinguished, the fire marshall's office declared the area a crime scene. Bruce Bussin, commodore of the 52-year-old club, said the IYC's members had speculated an arrest was imminent.

"There was some level of anticipation that would happen. A lot of rumours were circulating the night of the fire that a number of boys were behind the clubhouse and may have been responsible for setting the fire.

"We feel disappointment, sadness. Some are feeling anger," he said.

"I find it too beyond the realm of reality to ever think a 13-year-old boy would intend to cause a risk to members," he said. "I would think the parents of the boy or boys involved would be enormously upset."

The fire has thrown the club's summer plans into disarray, but Bussin said sailing will continue and members will be accommodated at the club's accessory buildings and other facilities, which were not damaged in the fire.

The site has been visited by an insurance adjuster and Bussin said there is no reason to believe the club will not be covered even if a member's son is convicted of setting the fire.

He said the IYC has received tremendous moral support from boaters and other yacht clubs in the Toronto area.

Herzl's dream

As Prof. Eugene Orenstein of Mcgill University has noted: "What Herzl succeeded in doing was to take Zionism beyond the domain of the traditional rabbis and the fledgling Jewish nationalist intellectuals who debated Zionism on the pages of tiny Hebrew periodicals read by small numbers of eastern European Jews, and place it in the arena of international politics."

One hundred years after his death, the movement Herzl founded is as vital an enterprise and as noble a cause as the day he addressed the very first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897. "Zionism... is a moral, lawful, humanitarian movement, directed toward the long yearned for goal of our people," Herzl thundered to the delegates and guests in Basel. Of all the revolutionary political movements and national ideologies that appeared on the horizon a century ago, the movement that Herzl founded is the only one that flourishes today. Zionism's triumph, the ingathering of vast numbers of Jewish exiles from the four corners of the earth, is still a work-in-progress, and the political embodiment of that enterprise, the modern State of Israel, is evolving.

That Israel is less utopian than its dreamers dreamed is not an indictment of that dream or of Israel. It is, rather, a testament to the simple humanity of its people. That Israel is a vibrant, hectic, technologically advanced democracy, governed by the rule of law, defended by a standing citizen's army, is also a testament to its people – that they will never let go of that original utopian dream. That Israel has not yet been able to find a way of living in peace with the Palestinians is also not an indictment of Zionism or of Israel. It is, rather, melancholy proof of the persistence of the unwillingness of Palestinian and other Arab leaders to accept in their midst the sovereign realization of "the long yearned for goal of the Jewish people."

But that Israel still strives to find a way to make peace, despite the ongoing Arab hatred for the Jewish state, is eloquent proof of the justice of the Zionist cause and its concern for the value of all human life.

Theodor Herzl's 100th yahrzeit is a fitting occasion to recall the core purposes, principles and values of the Zionist movement he was so instrumental in founding. For more than three decades now, Israel's enemies have perversely painted the Jewish state and Zionism as a portrait in dark, distorted colours. But Israel – and the Zionist dream at its centre – is an exceptionally beautiful canvas of many colours, many languages, many backgrounds and one everlasting hope from which all peoples could draw benefit, if only it were given the opportunity to live in peace with all of its neighbours.

Herzl concluded his remarks in Basel with the following exhortation. The words were also intended for us to hear today.

"Our Congress shall live forever; not only until the redemption from age-long suffering is effected, but afterwards as well... let our Congress be earnest and high-minded, a source of welfare to the unhappy... of honour to all Jewry. Let it be worthy of our past, the renown of which, though remote, is eternal."

Obsession with Israel

What is the reason for the juvenile and myopic focus of the press on the Mideast? Two answers come to mind – the first is that journalism is allowed in Israel, unlike in most Arab countries and other areas of conflict. The second is that journalists live in relative safety in Israel and can to go back to their comfortable hotel at the end of a hard day's work. For a journalist to go to Somalia or Chechnya is a risk to his or her life, just as when a Reuters crew were forced, upon pain of death, to hand over their film to terrorists in Ramallah two years ago.

The above does not justify the unbalanced coverage of the tiny country of Israel. Journalists hide behind the safety and sanctity of the Jewish state, and then peek out to throw stones at the very protectorate they condemn.

Kudos to synagogue

Kudos to the Pride of Israel Synagogue, which recently installed a central bimah at floor level in its main sanctuary, enabling people with disabilities to be honoured with aliyot to the Torah. This, in addition to its existing outside ramp, makes the synagogue a rare breed in the GTA, providing for those unable to negotiate stairs.

Most of the other synagogues equipped with outside ramps, many funded by the government, have so far failed to recognize the needs of the disabled inside the sanctuary.

The dignity of all congregants should be top priority, and how comforting it would be if all other synagogues would follow the example of the Pride of Israel.

Writer a lapsed Protestant

I was surprised to see myself described as a lapsed Catholic who had written a novel about Jews and Protestants in your article on the Jewish book awards ("'Lapsed Catholic' wins Jewish Book prize," CJN, June 3).

It's the reverse. As I mentioned when I accepted the Martin and Beatrice Fischer fiction prize for Mme Proust and the Kosher Kitchen, I am a lapsed Protestant, and the characters are all Jews and Catholics, starting with the French novelist Marcel Proust, whose mother was Jewish and father Catholic. My point was that writing fiction involves imagining what it's like to be somebody else.

Women have a key role

It seems Sara Horowitz's discontent ("Women and Judaism in the True North," CJN, June 10) with the seemingly limited range of options for women's engagement in Jewish spiritual life in Toronto is based on the mistaken premise that the primary locus of spiritual expression in Judaism is the synagogue. Yet, the home has been, and continues to be, the holiest and most important place for the practice of Judaism.

For instance, three important hallmarks of Jewish life are the observance of kashrut, Shabbat and taharat hamishpachah (family purity). All three are primarily practised in the home.

Furthermore, one must make a distinction between revolutions that promote Halachah and those that are counter to Halachah.

Horowitz states that she respects the boundaries of Halachah. Yet, she advocates for women to read the Torah, lead a congregation in song and lead the prayer service – clearly activities prohibited by Halachah when done in a congregation consisting of both men and women. On the other hand, the Bais Yaakov movement mentioned by Horowitz was by no means revolutionary in a halachic sense. One of its main goals, in addition to educating Jewish girls in the texts of Tanach, was, and continues to be, to foster a love and respect for adherence to the many mitzvot that girls are uniquely responsible for.

So-called egalitarianism in Judaism often implies giving women roles that are traditionally masculine. There is rarely, if ever, any notion of giving men roles that are traditionally feminine. Do those who promote an "egalitarian quorum" also demand that men be equally required to light Shabbat candles and separate challah?

If Jewish women would only learn and practise all the beautiful mitzvot that are their endowment, they would be too busy reaping their spiritual fulfilment to be concerned with men's obligations.

A place that counts women

In response to Sara Horowitz ("Women and Judaism in the True North," CJN, June 10), Holy Blossom Temple has a daily minyan that includes women in the necessary 10, and women participate fully in all aspects of Jewish ritual and synagogue life.

Ad was fact, interview was fiction

In last week's CJN, the interview with Liberal leader Paul Martin started on page 1 with the headline, "Always Defended Legitimacy of Israel." The rest of the interview continued on page 23. On page 9, there was a full page ad, presumably paid for by the Liberal Party of Canada, picturing six Liberal candidates who say they support Israel and a just peace for all in the Middle East.

For the actual truth, one had to turn to page 32 for a half-page ad supported by concerned Canadian citizens. It stated that during the Chrétien-Martin years, when there were a staggering 113 UN resolutions condemning Israel, Canada voted against Israel 78 times and abstained 35 times. Not once did Canada vote in support of Israel.

One can only hope your readers will be influenced by fact rather than fiction.

A "SOLUTION OF THE JEWISH QUESTION."

BY DR. THEODOR HERZL.

But we can do nothing without the enthusiasm of our own nation. The idea must make its way into the most distant miserable holes where our people dwell. They will awaken from gloomy brooding, for into their lives will come a new significance. Let each of them but think of himself, and what vast proportions the movement must assume! And what glory awaits those who fight unselfishly for the cause! A wondrous generation of Jews will spring into existence. The Maccabæans will rise again.

And so it will be: it is the poor and the simple who do not know what power man already exercises over the forces of nature, it is just these who will have firmest faith in the new message. For these have never lost the hope of the Promised Land.

Interfaith or interreligious?

Sarah Bernstein is an Israeli doing graduate work in forgiveness and reconciliation at a British university. In a recent essay, she follows up on the seminal distinction between two modes of religious dialogue: interfaith and interreligious.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Interfaith dialogue, she writes, "focuses on theology and its aim is to influence the belief system of the other religion." She cites as an illustration the efforts by the Catholic Church to modify its views of Jews and Judaism as a result of encounters with exponents of Judaism.

We could also point to "Dabru Emet," a document written by four distinguished Jewish scholars (including Prof. David Novak of the University of Toronto) and signed by hundreds of Jewish religious leaders in North America. It urges Jews to adopt a more positive attitude to Christians in the light of our encounters with them.

Interreligious dialogue, by contrast, "is a dialogue between people of different religions whose aim is to build relationships in order to improve inter-communal relations and work together for social change and justice." My previous column about the Interfaith Social Assistance Reform Coalition (ISARC) dealt with such dialogue.

Whereas interfaith dialogue takes place "between high-level leadership groups, examining the truth claims of the different religions," interreligious dialogue "takes place mainly at a grassroots level."

Though both are important, I have always been wary of the "high-level" variety. Though it makes for impressive statements and offers photo opportunities for participants, it rarely trickles down to ordinary worshippers. That is why, for example, despite the passionate pleas by the current Pope to purge Catholics of anti-Semitism, the grassroots effect seems to be limited, especially in his native Poland. That is also why "Dabru Emet" has had virtually no impact in the Jewish community.

By contrast, interreligious dialogue affects each of us as we encounter the other and recognize that, despite doctrinal differences, we have a lot in common, and, because we are people of faith, we can work together for a better society. Though it is a slow and painstaking process, the long-term effects are lasting and discernible. The work of Christian-Jewish Dialogue in Toronto and elsewhere is a good example.

The Bernstein essay I quoted from examines specifically the role of dialogue in peacemaking and peace-building and is especially relevant to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Bernstein works in that field in Israel and can point to instances of closer ties between Jews and Palestinians as a result of interreligious dialogue.

The task ahead is to involve more individuals in bringing their own religious tradition to bear on the issues of the day – in Canada, no less than in Israel – not to seek to convert the other, but to make common cause.

Random thoughts on the path to inner peace

Laundry. Dry-cleaning. Deadlines. Did I lock the door this morning?

I wonder how many calories are in a caramel macchiato.

These were some of the thoughts swirling in my head while I was supposed to be "contemplating the nature of my mind" at a three-day meditation retreat in Calgary that I attended several weeks ago.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

While I was told by the rapturous believers in the merits of meditation to watch the thoughts float in and out of my head without passing judgment, I found the cacophony of voices struggling for space quite amusing.

What follows are some pet peeves, joyous moments and, all in all, completely random and irrelevant musings that surfaced while I was trying to find that elusive sensation of inner peace.

1) There seems to be no consequences to false advertising. When I walked into my neighbourhood deli recently and ordered a "freshly-squeezed orange juice" off the menu, I was told to help myself to one from the fridge. When I questioned whether refrigerated juice could truly be freshly squeezed, I was told not to worry – they squeeze the juice out the day before and refrigerate it overnight. Well, it's not really freshly squeezed then, is it? "We have really high volumes of people here, so we can't make a fresh one for you," said the girl in the overwhelmingly empty store.

2) People who stare blankly at you when they don't have the answer and then make no effort to go find out the answer really irk me. This conversation actually happened one day: "I don't have a clue," a sales assistant replied when I asked her something relatively simple. "Well, could you refer me to someone who does?" I asked. "Oh, there's no one like that around here."

Evidently not.

3) There's a real double standard that exists for men and women when it comes to attractiveness. It takes a lot for a man to be considered ugly, and features such as baldness or a huge nose are sometimes seen as endearing – think Patrick Stewart or Adrien Brody. Not so for women, who spend zillions of hours and thousands of dollars to make themselves feel worthy. Would you like to see Barbra Streisand without any hair? I didn't think so.

4) I hate that guilt-induced obligation to keep an absolutely ghastly gift around the house because a friend gave it to you. I first experienced this peculiar sensation at age 12 when my best friend gave me a sculpture of kittens crawling all over a toilet. When the friendship ended several years later, the sound of that pseudo-toilet crashing onto the floor in a million pieces was like a sigh of relief. Now I have this designer lunch box that an ex-boyfriend gave to me. He and I are on good terms, so I'd feel bad getting rid of it. I'm sure some people would think it's very cool – it's got some kohl-rimmed Hindu priestess with multiple legs, arms and tongues on it. But I like to display vases and InStyle magazine on my coffee table, not tin boxes with tongues all over them.

5) The things that make me happy in life are those that don't cost any money – or are relatively inexpensive. So why do I keep pushing myself so hard to make more of it? Some of the things that make me happy: dandelions when they're gray and fuzzy; the feeling of the sun on my bare arms and legs; the downtime you experience after scrambling to finish a huge project; dreaming about old friends you haven't seen in a while; changing into a comfy t-shirt and Capri pants after getting off work; getting real mail with stamps on it that aren't bills or special offers from dating agencies or funeral homes; sitting by a rushing fountain; freshly picked cherries from the Okanagan; and brightly colored toenails.

After a day of meditating, resting, sitting in silence, and meditating some more, the only thing that has become apparent to me is that my mind is still as busy as ever.

Clearly, I have a long way to go to reach spiritual enlightenment.

A summer in Israel, free from LSATs

Immediately after I finish writing this column, I will be putting the last items in my suitcase before heading to the airport for my flight to Tel Aviv. I am brimming with excitement for another summer in Jerusalem, but since I have no exciting Israel stories yet to tell, I'd like to write about the one significant thing I've been grappling with since my last column went to press: the Law School Admission Test, or as it's more commonly known, the LSAT.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

For the past month, I have done little else besides study the ways of the standardized testing powers that be, in the hope of successfully conquering the LSAT. I am always amazed by those people – especially many of my friends, – who write the test after practising for no more than a few hours and emerge from the experience with disgustingly high scores, as if it was no big deal.

I have never been a fan of multiple choice tests – feeling the answers are never "good enough" for someone as particular as I am – so the LSAT became the ultimate barrier to overcome as I struggled to learn to think the way "they" wanted me to.

When about 10 people, all of whom have written the LSAT, make comments along the lines of, "I have never seen anyone study as much for the LSAT as you," it's probably fair to say significant effort has been expended. For me, this meant doing every practice drill and test I could get my hands on, and a spring that consisted of little more than logic games, analytical arguments and reading comprehension tests.

Now I stand in limbo. My thumbprints have been taken and my bubble sheet has been filled in, and the results of my labour rest in the hands of the good souls who slip my test through a computer to come up with the all-important final score. There is nothing left for me to do but wait.

> 'The real fun will begin this fall when I start to fill out law school applications.'

That said, I am not without opinions about the LSAT experience. Frankly, it was a cruel individual who devised this mode of assessment. I appreciate the benefits of a standardized measure of academic and intellectual ability and recognize the need for it, given the diversity of schools and experiences among law school applicants.

At the same time, though, I can't help but see the LSAT as a huge, and very painful, hoop-jumping exercise (as well as a test of bladder-control, being forced to sit for three hours without a break). The LSAT may very well be an effective measure of potential success in law school, but to me, having written the silly thing, it seems more than anything else like an effective measure of how well I could learn to take the test.

Perhaps this will benefit me in the long run, should I end up in law school. And I will not reject the possibility that my hours spent playing logic games will somehow serve me well in the career of my choosing, though I highly doubt it.

Thankfully, the ordeal is over, and, hopefully, I will never have to write the LSAT again. And the real fun will begin this fall when I start to fill out law school applications. At least that is a good two months away.

For now, it's off to the airport – first Pearson and then Ben Gurion. It will be a summer free from LSATs, though one engaged in legal theory, as I will be working for an international lawyer in Israel. Perhaps it will offer a taste of the future that the LSAT is supposed to bring. Perhaps it won't.

Either way, I will be in Israel, so what does it matter?

The Kirshner File

Theodor Herzl was an unlikely Zionist

The odyssey of Theodor Herzl, the indefatigable and irrepressible founder of modern political Zionism, is the stuff of amazement and incredulity.

That this Viennese proponent of assimilation transformed himself into the leading advocate and symbol of Jewish self-determination, all within the space of one tumultuous decade, is a cause of wonderment. That he methodically created, against all odds, a global movement that laid the intellectual and bureaucratic foundation for the State of Israel surely constitutes one of the most astonishing chapters in history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Exactly a century after his death, Herzl remains a compellingly curious figure. Here was a man who toyed with the idea of the mass conversion of Jews to resolve the ageless blight of anti-Semitism, but who beat a hasty retreat from this position of despair and self-loathing when he adopted Zionism – a term coined by Nathan Birnbaum in 1890 – as the answer to that gnawing malady.

Drawn to Zionism to resolve a personal crisis regarding his own Jewish identity, Herzl was an unlikely convert to the cause. Born in Budapest – a shining star in the constellation of the Austro-Hungarian empire – he was brought up in the spirit of 19th century liberalism. In accordance with this buoyant philosophy, he believed that assimilation offered Jews the best hope of shedding their distinctiveness and blending into European society.

But the yawning, unbridgeable gap between theory and practice disabused him of his unbridled optimism. While studying law at the University of Vienna, Herzl joined a students' society, but resigned in disillusionment after facing anti-Semitism.

By the 1880s, Austro-Hungarian Jews had attained civic equality and had achieved a measure of social integration. But these gains were offset by the emergence of political anti-Semitism – a variation on an old, familiar theme – and this toxic phenomenon had a lasting impact on Herzl.

Briefly a lawyer, Herzl drifted into journalism as an essayist, and then turned his talents to writing plays. In one of his works, The Ghetto, he rejected assimilation as a panacea to anti-Semitism.

In 1891, Herzl was appointed the Paris correspondent for the Neue Freie Presse, a distinguished, Jewish-owned Viennese daily. The assignment that changed his life was the 1894 trial of Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish officer in the French army who had been unjustly accused of treason on behalf of Germany.

The guilty verdict, as well as the chant by mobs of "Death to the Jews," left an indelible impression on Herzl: the emancipation of Jews in European societies was merely skin deep.

Now convinced that anti-Semitism was an immutable factor that could not be erased with a stroke of the pen, Herzl, a secular Jew far removed from the strictures of Orthodoxy, wrote The Jewish State, in which he called for the restoration of Jewish sovereignty and described Jews as "a people." It was published in 1896.

"We have sincerely tried everywhere to merge with the national communities in which we live, seeking only to preserve the faith of our fathers," he wrote plaintively. "It is not permitted to us. In vain we are loyal patriots."

Herzl acknowledged that his plan might be construed as the folly of a madman. "But if many Jews simultaneously agree on it, it is entirely reasonable, and its achievement presents no difficulties worth mentioning," he observed in a typical flight of fancy. "It depends on the Jews themselves whether this political document remains for the present a political romance."

Theodor Herzl

In 1902, Herzl fleshed out his conception of Jewish statehood in a novel, Old New Land, in which he envisaged a future Jewish state as a socialist, progressive utopia underpinned by science and technology and supported by such big powers as Britain, France, Germany and Russia.

Herzl's proposal, of course, was not original. As the historian Walter Laqueur has pointed out, the origins of political Zionism – which posits a belief in the existence of a common past and a common future for the Jewish people in one state – go back much further.

The forerunners of Herzlian Zionism were, among others, Moses Hess, Zvi Hirsch Kalischer and Leo Pinsker. In Rome and Jerusalem, Hess gloomily concluded that Jews would always remain "strangers among the nations," and espoused Jewish sovereignty in Palestine. In Seeking Zion, Kalischer reached strikingly similar conclusions. Hard on the heels of the outbreak of widespread pogroms in the Russian empire, Pinsker wrote Autoemancipation, in which he wrote of the need for a Jewish national centre.

In response to the pogroms in eastern Europe, idealistic Jewish high school and university students founded associations to promote Jewish immigration to Palestine. Within a few years, Jewish agricultural settlements – Mishmar Hayarden and Hadera, to name but two – were sprouting in Palestine, a Turkish Ottoman domain since 1517.

Although Herzl considered Palestine "our unforgettable homeland," he was prepared to compromise. After meeting Baron Maurice de Hirsch, the famous Jewish philanthropist who had financed Jewish colonies in South America, Herzl, in his diary, admitted that Argentina "would have a lot in its favour…"

Herzl's promotion of a Jewish state invariably fell on deaf ears. Wealthy Jewish businessmen, whose funds he solicited, hardly had the time of day for him, while Orthodox Jews considered the notion of an independent Jewish state as blasphemous.

Only in eastern Europe, where the oppression of traditional anti-Semitism bore down heavily on the Jewish masses, was Herzl hailed and were his assumptions embraced without equivocation. But even here, in Jewish national circles, Herzl was something of an unknown quantity.

In August 1897, he convened the first Zionist Congress at the Stadt Casino in Basel, Switzerland, and presided over the establishment of the World Zionist Organization. The meeting closed with the adoption of the Basel program, which called for "a home for the Jewish people in Palestine secured under public law." Writing with remarkable prescience, Herzl noted, " In Basel, I founded the Jewish state… Maybe in five years, certainly in 50, everyone will realize it."

Having officially launched the Zionist movement, Herzl – a superb organizer with a penchant for secret diplomacy – travelled far and wide to gain international legitimacy for a Jewish state in Palestine.

On his first and only trip to Palestine in 1898, Herzl lobbied the kaiser of Germany, Wilhelm II, who expressed a benevolent interest in the project but stopped short of officially endorsing it.

Ironically, Herzl was not overwhelmed by Palestine, a backwater the American novelist Mark Twain had dismissed as "a hopeless, dreary, heartbroken land." Herzl was repelled by the filth, the heat and the poverty, but he was singularly impressed by the cavalcade of Jewish horsemen, singing Hebrew songs, who welcomed him in Rehovot. Averse to creating a "linguistic ghetto" in Palestine, Herzl was skeptical of reviving Hebrew as a national language.

By the turn of the century, upwards of 50,000 Jews and 10 times as many Arabs lived in Palestine in a form of uneasy coexistence. Like some Zionists, Herzl did not foresee the tragic clash with the Palestinian Arabs looming in the distance. Perhaps he subscribed to Lord Shaftesbury's naive but oft-repeated slogan: "A land without a people for a people without a land."

It seems clear that Herzl and his followers were myopic. They do not appear to have regarded the Palestinian majority with sufficient gravity. But to give Herzl his due, the Palestinian national movement was still in its infancy in the late 1890s.

Herzl's inability to win an endorsement for Jewish statehood from Germany was part of a pattern of failure on the diplomatic front. The Ottoman sultan, who twice granted audiences to Herzl, was not receptive to Zionism either. (The Ottomans had banned the immigration of Russsian Jews to Palestine in 1893). Similarly, Herzl had no luck in persuading Britain to grant Jews permission to build settlements in Cyprus and El Arish in the Sinai Peninsula.

At the sixth Zionist Congress in 1903, Herzl proposed Uganda as a temporary refuge for Jews. But the scheme, which split the Zionist rank and file, was summarily shot down by the British.

Despite these setbacks, Herzl succeeded in transforming the inchoate yearning for Zion into a formidable movement that culminated with the birth of Israel in 1948. Amazingly enough, he never lost faith in his messianic mission."If you will, it is no dream," was his stirring motto.

When Herzl died on July 3, 1904, at the age of 44, he was already a historic figure of legendary proportions. He realized his dream, and the Middle East would never be the same again.

Jewish Life

The secret Jews of Iran

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

In 1839, an unfounded rumour spread among the Shi'ite Muslims of the town of Meshed in northeastern Iran that a Jewish woman had committed an act of disrespect toward Islam.

According to a period account preserved in the Central Zionist Archives in Jerusalem, an angry mob "attacked the Jewish quarter, broke into the Jewish houses, and robbed and looted everything they could lay their hands on. They beat the Jews cruelly, killed 36 Jewish men, and abducted many beautiful Jewish maidens taking them into the houses of Muslims."

Following this traumatic pogrom, the roughly 400 Jewish families in Meshed were forced to convert to Islam, an event that became known locally as the Allahdad. The word means "God's gift" in Arabic, but the Jews interpreted it as "God's punishment." Thereafter, they were known as the Jadid al-Islam or "new Muslims."

Outwardly, the Jews of Meshed practised Islam – they prayed in mosques, performed wedding ceremonies and buried their dead in accordance with Muslim rituals, even made the required pilgrimages to Mecca and Medina. Inwardly, however, they remained Jewish. As Raphael Patai writes in his 1997 book, Jadid Al-Islam: The Jewish "New Muslims" of Meshed (Wayne State University Press), nothing could have prevented them "from reciting the Jewish prayers in the privacy of their homes and maintaining the consciousness of being Jews and not Muslims."

The Jadidim kept a separate cemetery, fasted in secret on Yom Kippur, and kept up many Jewish rituals away from the prying eyes of their Shi'ite neighbours. These crypto-Jews of Meshed thus maintained a complex dual life filled with a parallel assortment of difficulties and perils that the Conversos must have faced in Inquisition-era Spain.

Gotthard Deutsch and Elkan N. Adler, writing in the Jewish Encyclopedia about a century ago, numbered the colony of secret Jews in Meshed at about 2,000 and noted they had been forcibly converted in the previous century "under the cruel reign of Shah Nur al-Din's father." They also noted that some had migrated to "transcaspian territory" and were practising Judaism in Merv, Ashcabad, Bokhara and Samarcand.

Patai began his research in the 1940s by conducting extensive interviews with elders of the Meshed Jadidim community who had arrived in Jerusalem. He wrote some articles at the time, then let his knowledge grow and mature for half a century. His book on the Meshed Jews was one of his last. The prolific scholar died in 1996 at the age of 85, leaving this significant work to be published posthumously.

Through a masterful examination of many sources, the book traces the history of Jewish life in Meshed before, during and after the Allahdad. One chapter describes the "decade of blood libels" that began in 1892. Another focuses on the lure of early Zionism, which brought many members of the endangered community to Eretz Yisrael. Yet another is devoted to the many folktales and legends that sprang up among this singular subtribe. Patai also discusses birth customs, Jewish names and origins, Hebrew education, marriage and burial customs, and provides a glossary of Judeo-Persian vocabulary.

The book offers a fascinating account of a little-known branch of the Jewish family tree whose roots date back 2,500 years to ancient Persia at the time of the first exile.

(The Jewish Encyclopedia mentioned above was published between 1901 and 1906 and contains more than 15,000 articles and illustrations that are now in the public domain. Both scanned and text versions of this work are freely available at the internet site www. jewishencyclopedia.com. Makes for great browsing!)

You can never really go back

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Among the different types of love the Talmud lists is the love for place – the affinity one has for the place he calls home or the place of his birth. True to this, I have always been a keen and passionate student of the history and culture of the Jews of North Africa. After an absence of 35 years, I was recently able to visit the place of my birth, Morocco.

As I prepared for this trip, I wondered what its effect would be on me, both emotionally and spiritually. What would it be like to stand again in the streets of my childhood, to see through the eyes of an adult what a child experienced? How different would the reality be from the romantic fantasies we all build for ourselves in our minds?

What was most remarkable to me was the total lack of emotional impact the trip had on me.

True, I marvelled at the architecture, the decorative intricacies of the plasterwork, and the vibrant colours of the mosaics and pottery. Certainly, I was bemused at the way of life that continues seemingly untouched by time and progress. But I felt more like a tourist visiting an exotic land than someone on a homecoming. There was a definite detachment.

I then recalled how so often, in my work with bereaved families, I am called on to say the last words of tribute about individuals whose lives began in pre-war Europe. They are people who were born in places of distinction and great importance to our people, communities such as Lodz, Munkatch, Radin, Stashiv and the like. These locales, whose importance to Jewish history is far greater than their size, were destroyed and are truly no more. While geographically they can be found on a map, they long ago ceased to exist from a Jewish point of view.

Yet, their existence continues in a different way today, all over the world, in the people who once lived there, and in their families.

And so it is with the cities of North Africa, where half a million Jews once had homes, families and communities. They are gone, but their legacy has spread around the globe to every place where they and their descendants now live.

So for me, there really was nothing to go back to. These great centres – Marakesh, Meknes, Fez – that are now bereft of Jews are comparable to cemeteries. One goes to a cemetery in the hope of making a connection, but one soon finds that is impossible.

The connection with our past is not to be found on the stops of our long journey in the Diaspora. Our connection with our past is within ourselves and the lives we lead.

That's how we can cement the bridge connecting past and future, and ensure the strength of the next generation.

Jewish Life

A history of Jews in America

Books
Bernard Baskin

American Judaism: A History* by Jonathan D. Sarna, Yale Press, $53

This year marks the 350th anniversary of Jewish settlement in North America.

In 1654, 23 Spanish and Portuguese Jews arrived in Dutch New Amsterdam from Recife, Brazil, fleeing the Inquisition. Although not the first Jews to set foot in North America, they were the first who intended to settle there.

Try as he might, Peter Stuyvesant was unable to keep "these hateful enemies and blasphemers of the name of Christ" out of the colony. Economic considerations won out over religious scruples.

In time, these indomitable settlers built homes and synagogues and forged a new way of life in a colonial wilderness.

Successive waves of Jewish immigrants from central and eastern Europe made their way – not without pain and privation – to a New World of hope and opportunity. They overcame manifold obstacles, struggled and prospered, and contributed to all aspects of American life and culture.

Over and over again, American Jews rose to meet the challenges both internal and external that threatened their continuity. "Casting aside old paradigms, they transformed their faith, reinventing American Judaism in an attempt to make it more appealing, more meaningful, more sensitive to the concerns of the day," Jonathan Sarna writes in American Judaism: A History.

At the same time, it comes as no surprise that Jews should feel bewildered and uncertain. Sarna writes: "Should they focus on quality to enhance Judaism or focus on quantity to increase the number of Jews? Embrace intermarriage as an opportunity for outreach or condemn it as a disaster for offspring? Build religious bridges or fortify religious boundaries? Strengthen religious authority or promote religious autonomy? Harmonize Judaism with contemporary culture or uphold Jewish tradition against contemporary culture? Compromise for the sake of Jewish unity or stand firm for cherished Jewish principles?"

Sarna is especially helpful in describing the beginnings, development and changes in the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements, against an environment shaped by American Protestantism, capitalism, the ideals of freedom and the reality of diversity. "What is distinctive in American Judaism," maintains the author, "is largely a result of these factors."

In a chapter entitled Anxious Subculture, Sarna discusses the unresolved question of whether American Jewry could have done more to rescue the Jews who fell under Nazi rule during the 1930s and early '40s? "Many conclude that anti-immigrant sentiment, persistent isolationism, burgeoning anti-Semitism (in 1938, according to one poll, ⅓ of all Americans wanted to "drive Jews out of the United States"), and the politics of expediency, coupled later with the president's insistence that the best way to save Jews was to win the war, would have rendered even the most zealous Jewish rescue campaigns largely futile," he writes.

Sarna is a pre-eminent scholar of American Jewish history and this magisterial work is authoritative and filled with basic information. It also portrays colourful personalities and reveals telling anecdotes and little-known events. Most of all, the book is a pleasure to read.

Positive in outlook, Sarna concludes "that today, like so often before, American Jews will find creative ways to maintain and revitalize American Judaism. With the help of visionary leaders, committed followers and generous philanthropists, it may still be possible for the current 'vanishing' generation of American Jews to be succeeded by another 'vanishing' generation, and then still another."

To which we can only add, "Amen."

Readers' best of the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every week, I troll the Internet to find the best Jewish and Israeli websites. But on the web, there are always new sites I haven't seen. Thankfully, there are readers who want me to know about them.

This week and next, I once again turn this column over to readers who have recommended sites that have caught their eye – or that they may have created themselves.

Are you a devotee of the South Beach Diet and looking for kosher assistance? Do you know how to create the texture and shape of the perfect challah? Where can you get a cheap but delicious meal in Jerusalem? Those are some of the recent questions that have been swirling at Yahoo's Jewish-food group list.

Just imagine being able to talk about Jewish food with a couple thousand of your closest friends and you'll get an idea of what you'll find here. Once you register – at no charge – you'll be able to ask your own questions and scour the archives, which already hold more than 40,000 messages.

Thanks to food maven Norene Gilletz for telling me about this amazing resource. [http://groups.yahoo.com/group/jewish-food/]

Stephen Epstein wrote to tell me about some of his impressive projects. In addition to being a photographer, Epstein is interested in "lost Jews." They may be lost because they descended from exiles from the northern kingdom of Israel in the eighth century BCE. Or they could have become lost due to the forced conversions to Christianity in Spain and Portugal in the 15th century.

The "Kulanu" (All of Us) website documents efforts to find "lost and dispersed remnants of the Jewish people." What I particularly like about this site is the index of places where you never dreamed there were Jews or descendants of Jews, as well as the first-person essays about the efforts to find them and establish their lineage. [www.kulanu.org]

I received a note telling me about Milingua, an online introductory Hebrew course. If you want to boost your Hebrew vocabulary, you can subscribe to the free "Learn One Hebrew Word a Day." Every day a word will be delivered to your e-mail box. The free online beginners' course uses audio and drag-and-drop tools to teach the basics of Hebrew syntax. By the time you're done, you should know a few hundred words, as well as the present tense. [www.milingua.com]

Jordy Cummings considers himself a "leftist." Along with a couple of friends, a "centrist" and one who's "right wing," they've created the Pure Polemics blog. The three also consider themselves Zionists, although it would probably take some debate for them to reach a common definition of that word.

What's great about this site is that it never lets you get complacent in your beliefs. But on the other hand, sooner or later you're bound to come across a point of view you agree with. In the often belligerent world of Israel on the Internet, Pure Polemics can be a thoughtful island. [http://purepolemics.blog drive.com/]

What is the role of the rebbitzin in the 21st century? That's one of the issues addressed in the online periodical Women in Judaism: A Multidisciplinary Journal. Editor Dina Eylon wrote me to tell me abut the journal, which addresses such topics as "Negotiating Passover: Women, Food and Power" and "Hidden Worship: The Religious Rituals of Orthodox Jewish Women."

In the "rebbitzin" article, wives of rabbis talk about congregational expectations, whether they feel they can have friends among congregants and how their roles are changing. Also, check out the site's fiction and artwork. [www.utoronto.ca/wjudaism/]

Jen "Jenny Lynn" Sonstein Maidenberg is a genuine Jewish cowgirl and has the website to prove it. Jen is half of "2 Jewish Cowgirls," transplanted northeasterners living in Tucson, Ariz. [http://2jewishcowgirls.com/] The site includes helpful hints for distinguishing born 'n' bred cowgirls from those who have only recently discovered their "inner Jewish cowgirl." At the site's general store, you can outfit yourself with a shirt that says, "Kosher Cowgirl," a bib proclaiming the bearer as a "Kosher Cowboy" or my favourite, a T-shirt emblazoned with that immortal Jewish cowboy phrase, "Yippee-Chai-Yay."

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website? If you've created a site you're proud of or find yourself visiting one over and over again, tell me about it at the address below.

Tale of Hana's suitcase continues to resonate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

George Brady still shakes his head at the coincidences that have marked his life and that have made his late sister's name, Hana, known around the world.

Four years ago, when he first walked into the offices of The CJN and hesitantly suggested that perhaps there was a story in Hana's life in Theresienstadt and in the suitcase she took with her to Auschwitz, he had no idea he would touch as many hearts as he has.

Our front-page story spawned a children's book, Hana's Suitcase (Second Story Press), by Karen Levine, which would go on to win numerous awards, including the Canadian Library Association's Book of the Year for 2003.

Translated into more than 20 languages and read in more than 27 countries, the book has sold an estimated 500,000 copies. What's more, it has allowed Brady to fulfil the self-imposed obligation to tell Hana's story, to remember her and to recount the young life cut short during the Holocaust.

Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon read Hana's Suitcase several months before the ill-fated shuttle disaster and was inspired by it. He took into space with him a drawing by Petr Ginz, one of the children who was with George and Hana at Theresienstadt. The drawing, Moon Landscape, depicted an imagined view of the the moon. Ramon mistakenly believed Ginz was on the same transport to Auschwitz as Hana.

In fact, said Brady, Ginz and another friend were on the same train as he was. When they arrived at the death camp, "I went one way, the two other boys went the other way."

Even before the CJN article was written and the book published, an amazing coincidence brought the suitcase to the fore. In Japan, Fumiko Ishioka, co-ordinator of the Tokyo Holocaust Centre, had requested the Auschwitz Museum send her an artifact that could be used in the centre's education programs.

Fumiko Ishioka, George Brady and the suitcase.

The suitcase proved tremendously popular, and on a trip to Theresienstadt, she met with the curator of the Terezin (Theresienstadt) Ghetto Museum to learn more about Hana. They noticed George Brady's name on a camp roster and the curator said she would call someone in Prague to see if he might know George.

Incredibly, the man in Prague, Kurt Kotouc, was Brady's bunkmate in Theresienstadt and had kept in touch with him after he moved to Toronto.

Brady's connection with Ishioka and with Hana's suitcase was made.

In another incident, one of Brady's schoolmates from his youth who now lives in Oakville, told the story of the suitcase to his sister in Prague. That sister, it turned out, immediately recognized Hana's name. In fact, she said, she was Hana's best friend in the camp and recalled many details about Hana that were in the book, including her favourite song about a centipede.

"It can't be a coincidence," Brady said. "I'm a logical guy, not religious, but..."

One of the countries particularly interested in the story is the Czech Republic, the successor state to Czechoslovakia, where George and Hana grew up. On a trip to Theresienstadt in the spring, Brady was interviewed for Czech TV by reporter Michal Kubal.

A few days later, Kubal was in Iraq, where he and three other journalists were kidnapped by insurgents. Following his release a few days later, Kubal "thanked me that my knowledge of survival in Auschwitz helped him in captivity." Brady said that Kubal credited his zest for life for inspiring him to survive the ordeal.

"It's strange all these things happened to me," he said.

Ishioka, who received an honorary doctor of laws degree from York University during a recent one-week visit here, said the suitcase continues to be the centre's most popular item. With it, she has travelled to more than 100 locations in Japan, from schools to libraries to parents' homes.

Children are fascinated by it, she said.

"Hana's story has everything. It's the story of brother and sister, of a mother's love. It doesn't only talk about the horrors of Auschwitz, but it has the story of two little kids being [refused] to go to school, to movie theatres," she said.

In Japan, the story is particularly relevant. "They learn that there are people of different religions, cultures and beliefs. They learn that human beings are equal. They see foreigners, but have no chance to become friends with foreigners. It's so different than Toronto."

Quoting Levine, Ishioka said "no matter their background, they have something to connect to."

That, no doubt, explains why the story continues to resonate, even after the Auschwitz Museum acknowledged the suitcase is a replica of the original, which had been destroyed in a fire set by neo-Nazis during the 1980s while in a display in Germany.

Educators have told him that doesn't change the suitcase's importance and value, Brady said.

In past years, Brady has been racking up flight points travelling around the world to tell the story. Brady addressed 1,200 students in Victoria, while in other locations, usually 500 to 600 youngsters at a time hear his talk about Hana and their lives.

YOU CAN'T PUT A BANDAGE ON TERRORISM

But you can help us try to stop the bleeding.

Within seconds, a terrorist strike in Jerusalem can cause devastating losses and massive injuries. Within minutes, victims arrive at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center. Shaare Zedek is overburdened by growing demand for its life-saving emergency care. A new 32,300 square foot Emergency Department, opening this year, will become Jerusalem's premier emergency facility. But equipment costs and other critical needs still outweigh the resources.

You can't put a bandage on terrorism. But you can help us save lives.

There's no excuse for lack of context in TV news

Television news about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict serves only to confuse viewers, according to a recent study of BBC and ITV coverage conducted at Glasgow University.

A June 22 BBC online report on the study, "Mid-East coverage baffles Britons," by John Read says the study found "many viewers think Israeli territory is occupied by Palestinians, not the other way round."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"And despite extensive media coverage of the conflict on television, some Britons believe Palestinians are refugees from Afghanistan."

Some Israeli media analysts are wary of other findings in the Glasgow study. For example, the study said Israelis were quoted more than twice as often as Palestinians in news reports.

Anyone even moderately familiar with the BBC's coverage of Israel over the past several years knows that Palestinian spokespeople, such as Hanan Ashrawi and Saeb Erekat, receive substantially more air time than Israeli representatives.

Jim Lederman, senior Israeli correspondent for Oxford Analytica remarked: "The BBC story toned down the criticism in the Glasgow report, that the BBC was insufficiently critical of Israel, and, in effect, put the blame on the viewers for their stupidity." He said both charges are false.

However, the study's main result comes as no surprise: When the university's Media Group asked a sample of "300 young people" what they knew about the conflict, Read said, "the response was quite shocking. Although many of those surveyed had a clear impression of the violence and tragedy involved, most had little understanding of the reasons for the conflict or its historic origins."

In other words, there was no context – a shortcoming endemic (but not exclusive) to television news, a problem that has been discussed in previous columns. While television is superb at capturing emotion-laden, sensational images, it too often fails to provide the background to what the viewer is seeing.

Read quotes the report's author, Greg Philo, who said there are two main reasons why viewers do not get the context they need.

"First thing is that there is a focus on violence and eye-catching images. And the second thing is that it's all so controversial.

"Journalists say to us that they are nervous of raising these kinds of arguments, because they get so much abuse," Philo said.

"They get hate mail, they get all kinds of people attacking them for being Nazis or anti-Semitic or whatever else."

Philo's last comment is patently contradictory. If a reporter provides an accurate account of why Israel carried out an operation in Gaza, for example, why would he or she be attacked as a "Nazi or anti-Semitic?" Indeed, it is the very absence of Israeli context that occasions complaints about bias against Israel.

Read's story includes comments from John Simpson, the BBC's world affairs editor and a veteran reporter on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict (unfortunately, from Israel's perspective, much of his reporting has been negative).

Simpson acknowledged that "we should be going back over the causes more, and we should be presenting things," but he added: "I don't think that's in a daily news context – I think that's much more in a sort of background reporting, or background documentaries." (A good example of the latter would be Impact of Terror on CBC's Witness, June 16. It both describes and explains in great detail how average Israelis have suffered from terrorism.)

All excuses aside, it is possible to provide context in TV news reports. It may be difficult, but that is no reason to avoid the challenge in favour of the easy, sensational image. If viewers are often baffled by events, journalists and editors need to ask themselves if they are adding to the audience's confusion by overplaying graphic images at the expense of meaning.

Reform movement grows in Israel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Reform Judaism is gaining a solid following in Israel, though its continued success may be hampered by the precarious security and economic situations there.

That was the message of three Israeli Reform rabbis, gathered in Toronto for a recent panel discussion.

"Our movement does well when Israel feels secure," said Rabbi Levi Weiman-Kelman, founder of Jerusalem's Congregation Kol Haneshama.

"We have to struggle much harder when Israelis feel insecure."

Rabbis Weiman-Kelman, David Forman and Kinneret Shiryon spoke about the Reform movement in Israel, as part of the the Central Conference of American Rabbis' (CCAR) recent annual convention.

Rabbi Shiryon, Israel's first female rabbi, sounded the most optimistic of the three, citing figures that attest to the momentum of the Reform movement there.

"Last year, Reform rabbis married over 1,000 couples and [led services at] over 1,000 bar/bat mitzvahs," she said. "There's a real movement taking hold in Israel."

Rabbi Shiryon, spiritual leader of a Reform congregation in Modi'in, presented a film featuring Israelis and North American visitors taking part in activities organized by Israeli Reform organizations.

The New York-born rabbi noted she will be involved in starting a Reform elementary school this fall, in co-operation with a Leo Baeck school in Haifa.

But the growth Rabbi Shiryon described is occurring in the face of several challenges.

"The success of my congregation feels linked with security and a yearning for peace," said Rabbi Weiman-Kelman, who, like the other two speakers, was raised in the United States.

"But the overwhelming challenge is actually economics."

The rabbi noted 20 per cent of his congregants are unemployed.

All three rabbis are involved in fighting for social justice in Israel and the Jewish world.

Rabbi Forman is the founder of Rabbis For Human Rights and has championed interfaith co-operation across the globe. Rabbi Weiman-Kelman is past co-chair of Rabbis for Human Rights and is engaged in interfaith and charitable work.

Rabbi Shiryon is active in women's rights circles and was chair of Israel's Council of Progressive Rabbis.

Their liberal views and social activism have drawn a mix of scorn and praise from Israelis.

"On a daily basis, we're verbally abused by both the Orthodox and the secular," said Rabbi Weiman-Kelman. "But I want to make it clear I wouldn't trade places with anyone in the world."

He said he views his congregation as somewhat of a haven for Israelis caught up in the protracted Middle East conflict.

"I'm aiming to create a community that can bring some relief from the suffering.

"For me, the congregation is my source of strength that allows me… to confront the enormous challenges of modern-day Israel."

The CCAR represents 1,800 Reform rabbis. Its four-day convention included a series of seminars and lectures, as well as votes on resolutions of political and social issues.

Mideast crisis seen hampering medical, scientific co-operation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The current intifadah and the Israeli military response to it are severely hampering efforts by the Canadian International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO) to effect medical and scientific co-operation between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East, according to Canadian, Palestinian, Jordanian and Israeli speakers at a recent CISEPO program.

The program, sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, was held at Mount Sinai Hospital. It featured Hani Abdeen, dean of medicine at Al Quds University; Hillel Bercovier, vice-president of research and development at Hebrew University; and Wajih Owais, president, Jordan University of Science and Technology.

The moderator was Catherine Chalin, professor, department of public health sciences, faculty of medicine, University of Toronto.

Otolaryngologist Arnold Noyek of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, and CISEPO's chair, said the organization was invited in 1995 by the late King Hussein of Jordan to "build bridges across the border and between peoples, which would lead to academics and institutions working together in a non-political way."

Noyek said they recognized that "we can't make peace, but we can get [the process] off the ground."

The common ground chosen for research was genetic ear disorders, a widespread condition in the Middle East.

CISEPO has reached out to various institutions, Noyek said, including Tel Aviv University and the University of Bethlehem, with everyone on all sides strongly committed to the process.

Abdeen said Al Quds University, with campuses in the old city of Jerusalem and Abu Dis, boasts the first Palestinian medical school, which now graduates 40 physicians a year.

Because the school is new, and because both financial and human resources are limited, the university decided to ask for help from "our neighbour Israel and our brothers the Jordanians," to help build the infrastructure.

Surprisingly, Abdeen said, the students were resoundingly in favour of such co-operation, unlike the staff, who held widely divergent opinions because of the political situation.

The students won the day, he said, and Al Quds students were able to go to various medical schools in Israel as clinical clerks and to study specialties.

When the second intifadah started three years ago, things changed. "Military checkpoints prevented travel back and forth across the border, and the security wall is only making things more complicated," Abdeen said.

Lack of accessibility for students from Gaza is a reality, he said, as is the fact that students have been stranded for three months in Nablus.

During the question period, he noted that staff are unable to get past the checkpoints and the security wall.

"Last year, we had 2,000 applicants for 30 places at the Al Quds medical school." Palestinians, he said, see medicine as a stable profession.

It is difficult, Abdeen said wryly, to get people in the Middle East to sit down and talk together. CISEPO, he said, has acted as a mediator and a facilitator, as has the Middle East Hearing Association."

He said he hopes that a maternal and child health program will be the next area CISEPO tackles.

Teleconferencing and e-learning are helping to bridge the gaps in medical and continuing medical education, he said.

Hebrew University sees regional co-operation as a priority, Bercovier said. "If colleagues from Jordan, Egypt, Palestine and Israel will all be at the same level, the region will be a much better place."

Common problems such as bacteria, mosquitoes, pollution and the distribution of water are no respecter of political boundaries, he said, particularly considering the "ridiculous distances" between Israel, Palestine and Jordan.

Owais said that it was "nice" for academics to co-operate and learn from each other. However, he warned, "if it doesn't filter down to the grassroots, it won't lead to anything."

It is all a question of trust, he said. "We don't trust each other because we don't see each other as human beings."

That can only change through education, communication and dialogue, he said. "We must stop denying the rights and not respecting the points of view of the other side."

If schools can teach math, chemistry and physics, Owais asked, why can't they teach how to live together in peace with respect?

Baycrest Challenge gets new name, new venue

By CARA EDELL

Get ready to lace up your shoes and join thousands of participants July 11 in the new and improved Baycrest Great Lakes Challenge.

Partnered with Maccabi Canada, the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care will offer runners and walkers the chance to race for a good cause on a five-kilometre track.

The 23-year-old event, which used to be called the Baycrest Challenge and was traditionally held on Mother's Day, will be run this year at Downsview Park. Proceeds will go to research into Alzheimer's disease and other cognitive disorders.

"We're really excited about our new venue and our new date," said Rob Eisen, chairman of the event committee.

He said the goal this year is to attract more people from the running community, and to his excitement, people from across Ontario and as far as Vancouver and Florida have already registered.

Aside from hosting a short-distance run and power-walking competition, organizers will also introduce team challenges to the event.

The morning's action will include a Protectors Championship, in which firefighters, armed forces personnel, police officers and members of other security and medical services can compete for medals and merchandise.

"We're really hoping this will take off and grow into a large part of our event," Eisen said.

The event will also feature a Masters Championship for runners over 40, a Corporate Team Challenge for businesses and a Running Club Challenge, he said.

Championship clocking will make judging the races more accurate, with tiny chips attached to runners' shoes automatically timing all participants, Eisen said.

The Great Lakes Challenge will begin at 8:30 a.m. and an award ceremony will follow at 9:30 a.m. Cash prizes for top finishers and draw prizes for all runners and walkers will be presented.

A baggage check, snacks and massages for participants are some of the services that will be provided.

As a bonus, Eisen said, anyone admitted into the site will receive a free pass to the park's Aerospace Museum.

To register for the event or to inquire about sponsorship opportunities, call 416-785-2500.

SUPPORTING VICTIMS OF TERROR: Beth Tzedec Congregation recently presented "Nishmat Tzedec, A Righteous Soul," a program in support of Israel and victims of terror. A number of native Torontonians have been killed by terrorism in Israel, among them Chezi Goldberg, who was honoured during the evening. Members of Goldberg's family in attendance included his mother, Ruth, his brother Ronn and his sister and brother-in-law, Marla and Shmuel Figdor. The evening included a video presentation and photographs of scenes of terrorist bombings by photographer Eric Lawton, accompanied by music written by Beth Tzedec's Cantor Meir Finkelstein and Chayim Frenkel of Pacific Palisades, Calif. Concert chair Shep Gangbar announced that a fund has been established to assist Goldberg's wife and seven young children. From left are Shmuel Figdor, Marla Figdor, Ronn Goldberg, Ruth Goldberg, Shep Gangbar, Cantor Meir Finkelstein, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Cantor Chayim Frenkel.

98-year-old keeps busy writing his memoirs

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

John Freeman's memories are all that linger of a life filled with meaningful personal experiences and events that have long been documented in history texts.

After almost a century of witnessing the highs and lows of the places he has called home and establishing himself as a business and family man, 98-year-old Freeman continues to write his memoirs.

"I have written an awful lot of my memories," he said in an interview. "I have hundreds of pages, all typed and easy to read. There are different items, all different, everything under the sun that happened to me. I have memorized them all and written them down.

"Life was different back in my day, and all those differences are very interesting. My wife used to say that anything in print was my meat and potatoes, which was true."

Freeman said his fascination with words began at an early age. His mother said he could read at three years old, whether in English or in Dutch, he does not remember.

"I read a lot as a youngster, enough to spoil my eyes. I wore glasses all my life. Now, my eyesight is 90 per cent gone. And my hearing is probably three-quarters gone. So I am in great disability. People don't want to talk to me, even if they are interested in a subject that I could tell them about. I am much more interesting than you could think."

One of Freeman's earliest, most vivid memories dates back to 1912, when he was a young boy, "thirsty for knowledge and information" that only newspapers could provide.

At six years old, the "big item in the news was the construction of a new steamship, which was to be called the Titanic," he said.

"All went well to start with, but on the third day, I think, calamity struck, whether it was on a moonless night, I don't know, but the Titanic going at full speed struck an iceberg so hard that it was embedded into the iceberg deeply at the waterline. It stayed lodged there for perhaps a day and a half, gradually filling with sea water at the breakages," Freeman wrote in his memoirs.

Two years ago, he had a stroke that confined him to a wheelchair and wiped away most of his memories.

"My memories are all gone except what I have written. Before the stroke, I had written a lot. Since the stroke, I have been able to start again from the beginning. Up to a point, my memory was too good. It suffered badly because of the stroke, but it's still pretty good," he said.

By refamiliarizing himself with his life's timeline, Freeman said he is now able to share memories stretching as far back as his youth.

Born in England in 1906, Freeman said he lived in London until he moved with his parents and three younger siblings to Montreal in 1910.

"We came to Montreal because my mother's brother had moved there before, and he was well established as a watchmaker. He had a contract from the CPR [Canadian Pacific Railway] to check the watches of all the train men who passed through Montreal… In Montreal, my mother had three more children. I was the oldest of six."

Freeman said he went to school in Montreal and at 15 went to London, England, alone. He got a job with an uncle, a brush manufacturer, and spent 20 years working in a factory there. Freeman eventually became managing director of the business, a job he considered "quite important."

Freeman said he visited Montreal in 1930 – a trip he will never forget.

An avid reader, Freeman said on his visit to Canada he was "very put out" to hear that Montreal's Jewish Public Library was closing.

"I always had a book at my side, I have never read a novel in my life. Serious books only, like a young student would. I was a good customer for the library," he said.

The Jewish library – which Freeman called his "second home" – was to be converted into an office space. He said he decided to investigate the closing, and on entering the building, he saw a girl at a desk on the telephone.

"There was no one else there, but the books were still on the shelves. She motioned for me to sit down in front of her. She talked for quite a long time on the phone.

"When she was talking, she wasn't facing me, but sat kind of sideways at her desk. It had drawers on each side, but the middle was open. And through the open middle part, I could see her legs. And I decided they were the nicest legs I had ever seen. Well-shaped, fully curved, and really, for me, it was a treat to look at them, because I had never looked at women's legs, ever," he said.

Women had never interested Freeman before, but at that moment he said something changed inside him.

"I have got to have those legs. Even if it means I have to marry her," he decided.

Discussing the library's closure led to a lunch date the next afternoon, which soon after led to marriage for Freeman and Dorothy Blumfield.

"I finally persuaded her to come to London and marry me in 1932," he said. "I was 26 years old; she was 24. We got married two or three months after she arrived."

In 1940, Dorothy convinced her husband to return to Montreal, because of the impending war in Europe. She said she wanted to have a family, but not in England.

"A few weeks, or a few days later, Dorothy was pregnant with a baby girl, Carol," Freeman said. Their second daughter, Wendy, was born in 1946. Both of his daughters are married with families of their own.

All her life, Dorothy was "an accomplished social worker and a very good leader," he said. She taught for 30 years at McGill University after World War II, until she retired. The couple then moved to Toronto in 1978 and Freeman gave up the brush business.

"We began to live what I would call a normal married life. I had no job to do, we had enough income not to have to worry, and she kept socially quite busy. I carried on, mostly reading," he said.

After 63 years of marriage, Dorothy died in 1995. She was more than 80 years old.

"The upshot was that I never mentioned to her that I married her because of her legs. Which is kind of ridiculous now, but for me, then, it wasn't very important even to mention it. She had more interesting things for me than looking at her legs. We got on very well together," Freeman said.

In 2002, Freeman moved to Cummer Lodge. He celebrated his recent 98th birthday with his youngest sister from Montreal, who is now in her 80s.

Freeman insists his health is first class, but admits his age carries certain burdens.

"Being alone is the worst of all. The last good friend that I had died two years ago. He was 85. Since then, I have hardly talked to anyone. Things here are quite difficult for me. I'm beginning to talk to myself."

He said many people who visit him at the lodge come to him with a watch in hand, "ready to leave before they start."

Now dedicated to preserving his memories in print, Freeman said he would like his writings to be published.

He said people choose to stop learning, not knowing there is so much left to learn, especially from a person like himself.

"I think my memories would be very interesting to most people. Not to the illiterate ones, but to the ones who can read English and appreciate what they are reading."

95-year-old alumna gets honorary diploma

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – There were no real surprises among the 12-year-olds who graduated Grade 6 this year from Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools' (JPPS) elementary school.

No wait, actually there was. One of them was 95 years old.

As part of JPPS' 90th anniversary, Mary Pencer received an honorary degree more than 90 years after entering the Peretz Schools' very first kindergarten class in 1913.

"I'm proud, but also humbled," said Pencer, who received her diploma from JPPS-Bialik High School president Matt Newpol in ceremonies held at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim. She got a rousing ovation from the crowd.

Pencer may very well be the last surviving member of her incoming class.

Sounding spry, alert and much younger than 95 in a later phone conversation, Pencer said she still comes in every day to an investment company office where she's worked for 45 years.

She joked that she is actually "95-and-a-half.

Pencer said she recalls parts of the Peretz School years, but hardly anything from those first kindergarten days.

"At my age, there are things you shouldn't remember but you do, and certain things you should remember but you don't."

One thing she does remember is that almost 60 years before merging with the Jewish People's Schools in the early 1970s, the Peretz School's original name was the Yiddish National Radical School.

Before it erected its own building near de Bullion and Prince Arthur streets, the school's very first classes were "in a home on St. Dominique or Coloniale," Pencer recalled.

Pencer recalled that the school had a reputation for being dominated by "socialists and radicals." She remembers famed Yiddish poet J.I. Segal as one of the teachers, but she has only faint memories of the Peretz School's founder and decades-long leader, Yaacov Zipper.

Born on Kol Nidre night in 1908, Pencer has lived a full life. She and her late husband Abe raised two children, son Edward and daughter Elca, who still lives in Montreal and tends to her mother's needs. She also has six grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren.

Pencer now lives on her own at the Castel Royale seniors residence in Cote St. Luc and said she spends her time "keeping busy."

Her faculties, she said, are fine, but, she adds with a laugh, "from the neck down, kapores [good for nothing]."

Where have all the heroes gone?

Older and younger Jews differ when it comes to icons

Differences between the generations are as old as time itself. Each one looks at the world through the unique cultural, political, technological, economic and social trends of the times.

Who are heroes to today's young Jews? How do they compare with those of their parents and grandparents?

The CJN recently spoke to a non-representative sample of the community about who they consider to be their icons.

By CARA EDELL AND JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Interns

When former Refusenik and current Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky came to town on a North American campus lecture tour, Zac Kaye was shocked that so few students went to see him and that many didn't even know who he was.

"When Sharansky came to speak at York [University] earlier this year, we expected a lot of students would turn up. But the crowd was mostly composed of older people – faculty members who saw him as their hero," said Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Golda Meir

"We expected a major draw, but that was not the case. Students asked, 'Who is Sharansky?' He was a hero in so many ways."

It was a telling moment, Kaye said.

"It became clear that the icons of young people today are not those of people 20 years ago. I see a general sense of people asking what a hero even is. We don't have leaders today like we did in the past."

Both older and younger Jewish adults agree that the people they admired growing up have influenced who they have become. But many teens and young adults say they either don't have any heroes, or they name their parents and grandparents as the iconic figures who have shaped their lives.

Those who do name public figures tend to mention entertainment and sports celebrities and educators, in contrast to older Jews who often cite leading political figures of the 20th century as their role models.

For many, these larger-than-life heroes were the stuff of their youth.

"When you get older, it's more difficult to have heroes. You can just respect and admire people," said Irwin Koziebrocki, a Toronto lawyer and father of four children who range in age from 18 to 25.

John F. Kennedy

He said the people he looked up to as a young man – leaders such as Golda Meir, John F. Kennedy and Pierre Trudeau, whom his children now study in history books – influenced his philosophical and moral worldviews.

While Meir, Israel's only female prime minister, governed far from where he lived, Koziebrocki said her dedication to her adopted land inspired him as a Jew in the Diaspora.

"She put up with difficulties in a growing country being attacked by all sides. Most of us would have hidden," he said.

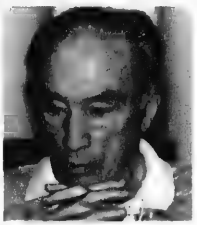
Like Meir, Koziebrocki said Kennedy, the 35th president of the United States, had a "common touch with people" and, as a relatively young man, changed the face of the world.

"He was charismatic, a person of the present, not of the past."

Trudeau, Koziebrocki said, was also a man who reflected "what appeared to be a modern age at his time." He became Canada's prime minister in 1968 and was a "phenomenon" who changed how Canadians looked at themselves.

"He was a strong federalist who believed in Canada as a nation, as opposed to in parts," Koziebrocki said.

Hillel's Kaye believes there are fewer strong leaders around than there used to be to serve as examples to young people.



Pierre Trudeau

For instance, he said, former U.S. president Bill Clinton doesn't compare to former British prime minister Winston Churchill or president Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who led their nations at critical moments in their histories.

"[Clinton]'s charismatic but full of flaws," Kaye said.

Barry Green, president of a produce company and a father of two kids, ages 18 and 20, said he wishes current politicians were more like Trudeau.

"I believed in his vision and I respected how he did things," he said, adding that today's political leaders break their promises when they win power.

But Green defines a true hero as "anyone who has overcome traumatic experiences" or disabilities.

He said reading biographies of people who have triumphed over tragedy, such as Helen Keller, "hits [him] in the heart."

Miriam Frankel, a Toronto grandmother of 13, agreed that heroes are people "who have risen to accomplish things to help themselves and others.

"It's the unsung people out there who I've admired," she said.

Menachem Begin

Frankel praised Rabbi Nachum Rabinovitch, a Toronto native who "made his name and mark" after moving to Israel more than 30 years ago, for "raising the standard of what Jews can accomplish."

She said Rabbi Rabinovitch left a settled and accomplished career in Canada – he served at Clanton Park Synangogue and taught mathematics at the University of Toronto – and dove into the uncertainty of living in Israel.

"He went as an idealist with a dream," Frankel said. "He made a huge contribution to the country and to us generally as Jews."

Among his achievements, Rabbi Rabinovitch opened Yeshivat Birkat Moshe in Ma'ale Adumim in the West Bank and trained immigrant students in secular and talmudic studies. Frankel said the students "are now in every branch of Israeli life.

"They are the crème de la crème of the people that Israel needs."

She said she defines a hero as someone who is ready to make a sacrifice and lives in accordance with a dream he or she strives to fulfil.

"Personally, I admire people who are convinced of how right a cause is and will fight for it – people who will not sit on a fence."

Terry Fox

Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews during World War II, was one such example, she said.

"He is a hero for the morals and ethics he exhibited during the darkest hours of the war," Frankel said. "It is unfortunate that people such as him pay the ultimate price."

When considering which other public figures meet her standards, Frankel noted that both Churchill and Menachem Begin faced large challenges.

In World War II, Churchill became prime minister of Britain and led a united British nation and Commonwealth in resisting the Nazi domination of Europe.

He was "able to get a country behind him in his pursuit to put an end to fascism," Frankel said. "He had power of conviction at a time when people wanted to cave in to the Nazis."

Lenny Kravitz

Begin, Israel's sixth prime minister, defied the British mandate and pursued his Zionist dream, said Frankel.

"They are two sides of the coin, but they both had courage and determination."

Sharon Gancman, an interior designer and mother of two kids, ages five and eight, said she was impressed with Terry Fox's "drive to succeed" despite his physical limitations.

Fox, who lost his leg to cancer, began a cross-Canada "Marathon of Hope" in 1980 to raise money for research on the disease. He stopped short outside Thunder Bay when the cancer spread to his lungs. He died in 1981, one month short of his 23rd birthday.

Rabbi Glenn Black

"You always hope, if faced with such obstacles, that you would not give up without a fight," Gancman said.

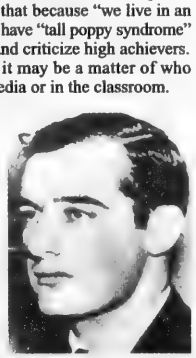
She said she admires Holocaust survivors for the same reason.

"You think that you'd give up, but they not only lived, they accomplished a lot in their lives. Financially they prospered, they went on to have families and businesses, and you wouldn't know the hell that they experienced so many years ago," said Gancman.

Like their parents and grandparents, today's Jewish teens and young adults also make personal connections with public figures, though Kaye speculates that because "we live in an egalitarian society," young people have "tall poppy syndrome" – a tendency to over-scrutinize and criticize high achievers.

But for many young people, it may be a matter of who touches them, whether via the media or in the classroom.

Eli Ekstein, who will enter Grade 12 this fall at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's (CHAT) Richmond Hill campus, said his hero is rock star Lenny Kravitz.



Raoul Wallenberg

Ekstein said he has looked up to Kravitz since he was 12 years old and shares similar Jewish values and beliefs with the musician, whose father is Jewish.

"He stands out because of his individuality and originality, how he incorporates four different kinds of music into one and how he takes Judaism very seriously, although his mother is not Jewish," Ekstein said.

No suspects in Ottawa synagogue vandalism

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Police have no suspects in their investigation into the desecration of Beth Shalom West Synagogue in the west-end Ottawa neighbourhood of Craig Henry.

When caterers arrived to set up for the bar mitzvah celebration of Joel Hameiri on Sunday morning, June 20, they discovered that the back wall of the synagogue had been covered in graffiti, some of it anti-Semitic and some of it illegible. Because there were swastikas and racial epithets, the police are treating the vandalism as a hate crime.

Mitchell Bellman, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, was called to the scene by Rabbi Howard Finkelstein and arrived even before the police.

"It is just a very disturbing sight to see the synagogue vandalized in this way and to see the scope of it," Bellman said. "The entire back wall was covered in graffiti."

On a positive note, Bellman said there was an immediate outpouring of support from the general community.

"We have received calls from the mayor, the premier and leaders of our community who are outraged by this and are making their voices heard," he said.

Ottawa Mayor Bob Chiarelli said that "while Ottawa prides itself as a multifaith and multicultural community of respect and tolerance, the attack on the Beth Shalom synagogue will remind us all that we must never let our guard down on acts of hatred."

Premier Dalton McGuinty also issued a statement condemning the attack.

"Hatred and intolerance have no place in our society and our government is committed to stamping out hate crimes, but everyone can play a role by assisting police, speaking out and promoting understanding," he said. "We're committed to building a province that will be made stronger by ensuring that all cultures and faiths are treated with the respect and dignity they deserve."

This obscene message was found at Beth Shalom West Synagogue in the Ottawa area.

NDP leader Jack Layton also issued a statement. "In the past, my colleagues and I have called for all parliamentarians to support the OCSE Parliamentary Assembly Berlin Declaration that condemns all anti-Semitic violence and seeks aggressive law enforcement by local and national authorities for hate crimes. Today, I renew that call."

As of last week, the police investigation was continuing.

"There are no suspects at this time, but we are examining the neighbourhood for similar graffiti, checking out people who have been involved in hate crimes of this nature and speaking to people in the neighbourhood," said Sgt. Ralph Heyerhoff.

Police have also spoken with Rabbi Finkelstein and suggested additional security measures that the congregation might take.

"We're far from done," Heyerhoff said.

Heroes often found in world of music, sports

Special Report

Julia Giddens, 21, said her heroes are stars of the music and sports worlds. The Ryerson University student said she idolizes R&B and gospel guitarist Robert Randolph and Calgary Flames captain Jarome Iginla.

Robert Randolph

"Robert Randolph is full of emotion and passion for what he does," she said. "I've admired him for the past three years. I've even been on stage with him [in Toronto in February]. That was an incredible experience."

She said Iginla, "is a captain that keeps his team intact."

Win or lose, Giddens said, he always has a smile on his face and never turns down an interview.

"He puts in his all and, by doing that, it usually pays off."

Iginla's positive attitude has rubbed off on Giddens, who said she tries to stay optimistic in all situations.

Lory Tobianah, 17, is a classmate of Ekstein's at CHAT. She said her heroes are leaders of the Jewish community and include Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth.

"They dedicate their lives to bring others close to their religion," she said. "They don't want a million dollars for a house. They don't want clothes with name brands. They want money to spend on groceries to have a huge Shabbat dinner, so they can keep their door open and have kids just walk in and out."

Tobianah said the shlichim (emissaries from Israel) who teach at CHAT are leaders that have directly affected her life.

"They leave their lives in Israel to make a difference in young people's lives, and they don't realize how much of a difference they actually make. They show us real way of living, what life is really about. It's really touching because you get a new perspective," she said.

Rabbi Avichai Zahavi is one shaliach who has inspired Tobianah. She said she knew she could confide in him during the school year and felt comfortable enough talking to him about her problems.

"The way they live their lives and the way they touch people made me realize that's the way I want to be when I grow up."

Depression remains one of most common illnesses

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Karen Lieberman, executive director of the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario, has declared the silence surrounding mood disorders officially over.

"From this point on, we encourage people to keep talking," said Lieberman, who has recovered from a decade-long battle with severe clinical depression.

She described her journey from "victim to patient to activist to loudmouth," at a recent symposium sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section.

Also on the panel was Dr. David Goldbloom, senior medical adviser, education and public affairs at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, and Carolyn Kirk, founder and CEO of Workplace Health and Wellness Limited. The moderator was Toronto Star journalist Robin Harvey, who is the third generation in her family to have bipolar mood disorder.

Lieberman said that when her mother, who is now 89 and was in the audience, battled clinical depression "we never talked about it; it just invaded our lives. As children, we learned that it is something that is horrible, dark and frightening."

In her own battle against the disease, she saw six doctors, was hospitalized 17 times, tried 27 different medications and had 24 shock-therapy treatments.

She now "goes out and speaks to anyone" on the topic of mood disorders, mental illness, stigma and recovery.

She has been honoured by Chatelaine magazine as Health Hero and by the Royal Bank of Canada for her work combating the stigma of mental illness, and she was featured on a CTV documentary about depression, Fighting the Dragon.

Goldbloom said that depression is an "unspoken problem" that strikes people from every walk of life, typically in their peak productive years, whether things are going well or badly.

"It is one of the most common illnesses in society, and it is one that carries the double burden of symptom and stigma."

The term "depression" is used very loosely, he said. "Sadness is a normal human emotion, and anyone who is depressed can tell in a heartbeat the difference between sadness and depression.

"[Depression] becomes a bodily illness. It disturbs sleep, appetite and energy. There is a highly predictable pattern of symptoms."

Every year, he said, 4,000 people in Canada kill themselves [due to depression], "and the irony is that it is a treatable illness. The vast majority of people can get better if they are treated. The gut response of a depressed person is that there is no hope, yet there is hope. There are a variety of ways to get better."

From left, Karen Lieberman, Carolyn Kirk, David Goldbloom and Robin Harvey at a symposium on mood disorders, presented by the National Council of Jewish Women.

Kirk, who specializes in treating workplace stress, anxiety and depression, says that depression makes up the fastest growing category of disability claims in Canada, and that estimated costs of mental illness in the Canadian labour force exceed $33 billion a year in lost production alone.

"The stigma attached to having a mental illness prevents many employees from seeking help, [and as a result] only about six per cent get the treatment they need [because they want to hide] what they're going through."

Kirk said it is the modern workplace that is laying the foundation for some of the mental health problems employees are experiencing.

With voice mail and e-mail bombarding people at all hours of the day, she said, it has become a 24-hour-a-day workplace, and over time employees suffer the treadmill syndrome. They have too much to do at once.

Another source of workplace stress is office politics, she said. Employees are not sure where things are headed, there is mistrust, and company direction and policies are unclear.

As well, she said, other employees may be self-serving and manipulative, so there is no sense of community. "People feel that being appreciated comes ahead of financial remuneration, yet there is a basic level of feeling underappreciated."

The upside, said Kirk, is that a lot can be done to combat this stress. "Make sure you get mental and physical activities that are separate and apart from work. Keep work in its important but proper place.

"Many people work in isolation, [but] you don't have to work in a vacuum. Get together formally in groups or informally with co-workers and colleagues. You can identify problems and exchange solutions and strategies. Share the load, and you'll find you lighten the burden," she said.

The hidden costs of mental illness can be eliminated, said Kirk, "if employees establish employee health and organizational health as twin priorities."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have a daughter who is 14. She decided recently to become a vegetarian, and I am concerned that she isn't eating properly. How can I help her?

A. Vegetarianism is a common trend now. It is most important to ensure that your daughter knows what the essential components of a well-balanced diet are.

Make sure she is eating enough protein. If she still eats dairy and eggs, they are good sources of protein. Soy and quinoa are vegan sources of protein. Quinoa (pronounced keen-wa) is a grain. Legumes such as chick peas, lentils and kidney beans, as well as nuts, are also good, but incomplete, sources of protein. In combination with certain other foods, they are a complete source of protein.

Encourage your daughter to eat a wide variety of foods. Eating vegetarian can be safe and healthy, as long as she is well-informed. Your daughter may find it helpful to discuss her diet with a dietitian or her doctor, or to read a good book on vegetarianism.

Q. Is it true that some medications contain lactose? I am lactose intolerant and was not aware of this.

A. Yes, some medications contain lactose, as do many vitamins. Ask your pharmacist to see a list of ingredients before purchasing medications or vitamins, as lactose is usually not disclosed on labels. Lactose can also be found in snack foods with flavourings such as salt and vinegar, fried foods such as chicken fingers and some hot dogs.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

RECORD MOVEATHON:
Members of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation team complete the 10K run in the Zareinu Moveathon. This year's Moveathon, held late last month, was the most successful ever, with more than 100 corporate sponsors, almost 500 participants and 2,000 attendees coming together to raise more than $700,000.

Time to celebrate fruit in all its diverse glory

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Summertime brings hot weather, casual get-togethers with friends and family and the richness of the summer harvest. Fresh, ripe, juicy fruits are in abundance at farmers' markets, roadside stands and your local supermarket.

If you are feeling overwhelmed and don't know what to do with all that bounty, don't worry.

David Lebovitz to the rescue! In his latest book, Ripe for Dessert, 100 Outstanding Desserts with Fruit (HarperCollins, $53.95 Cdn.), Lebovitz shares his passion for fruit and his treasure trove of inspired, innovative and luscious dessert recipes.

These sweets celebrate fruit in all its diverse glory, as Lebovitz's intensely flavourful and imaginative recipes show off the best of every season and reward every dessert lover's fancy. The recipes are divided by category, with an eye to the seasons. They feature apples, pears and quince from the fall harvest, citrus and dried fruits from winter, and stone fruits and berries for the height of summer. His recipes are sure to delight your sweet tooth year round.

Lebovitz presents pairings that will surprise and satisfy, including Anise-Orange Ice Cream Profiteroles with Chocolate Sauce, Chocolate Souffle Cake with Prunes, Cranberries and Kumquats. He even offers a fabulous, thirst-quenching Gingery Lemonade.

With Ripe for Dessert's bounty of easy, user-friendly recipes, you can transform your favourite fruits of every season into desserts that will impress and delight all the dessert lovers in your life.

You'll notice that this fruit cobbler is very low in the f-word (fat, that is), since Lebovitz uses buttermilk and only a modest amount of butter in the biscuits. So don't feel any guilt about enjoying this with a rewarding scoop of melting vanilla ice cream. You'll also notice that these biscuits are much fluffier than traditional biscuits. David especially likes the fluffiness because the biscuits soak up more of the tasty juices from the fruit.

NECTARINE & BLUEBERRY COBBLER WITH BIG FLUFFY BISCUITS

Fruit Filling:
7 medium or 9 small nectarines (about 3 lb.)
6 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tsp. flour
1 tsp. vanilla extract
One 6-oz. basket of blueberries

Biscuits:
1½ cups flour
1 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
2 tsp. sugar plus more for sprinkling
4 tbsp. (½ stick) unsalted butter, frozen
⅔ cup buttermilk
1 large egg yolk
1 tsp. milk

Position the oven rack in the centre of the oven and preheat the oven to 375.

To make the fruit filling: Cut the nectarines in half, remove the pits, and cut the fruit into ½-in. slices. In a large, deep mixing bowl, toss the nectarines together with the sugar, lemon juice, flour, vanilla and blueberries.

Transfer the fruit mixture to a 2-quart baking dish and bake in the oven for 40 minutes, stirring once during baking. (I recommend putting a layer of aluminum foil on the rack under the baking dish to catch any juices that may bubble over.) Remove the baking dish from the oven.

To make the biscuits: Mix together the flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt and 2 tsp. sugar. Using the largest holes on a box grater, grate the frozen butter into the flour mixture. Stir in the buttermilk until the dry ingredients are just moistened. Spoon the biscuit batter over the nectarines in 6 roughly equal mounds.

Mix the egg yolk with the milk and dab the top of each mound liberally with the egg wash. Sprinkle with a nice dusting of sugar and pop the cobbler back into the oven for 20 to 25 minutes, until the biscuits are browned.

Serving: Serve the cobbler warm with vanilla ice cream or a pitcher of very cold heavy cream.

Variations: Substitute peaches for the nectarines (but be sure to peel them). Substitute a 6-ounce basket of raspberries or blackberries for the blueberries or 1½ cups of pitted cherries.

GINGERY LEMONADE

Great lemonade should be served outdoors, in tall glasses, poured over crackling ice cubes. Since Lebovitz likes ginger a lot, he uses about 3 oz. per quart for a particularly robust lemonade. The more timid may prefer to make it with the smaller amount of ginger.

Either way, pour it over plenty of ice in a tall glass. You can dress it up with a few slices of fresh lemon or turn it into pink lemonade by adding a small splash of red fruit juice.

2 to 3 oz. fresh ginger, unpeeled and cut into thin slices
3 cups water
½ cup sugar
1 cup strained freshly squeezed lemon juice (6 to 8 lemons)
optional: ¼ to ½ cup cranberry or red grape juice

In a small saucepan, bring the ginger slices, water and sugar to a boil. Remove from heat and cover. Let steep for 30 minutes.

Strain the sugar syrup into a pitcher and stir in the lemon juice and the cranberry or grape juice, if desired. Discard the ginger slices. Chill the lemonade thoroughly. Serve over lots of ice. Makes 1 quart, about 4 servings.

JACK BLITZ ז"ל

It is with profound sorrow that the family announces the passing of Jack Blitz ז"ל.

Jack was born in Winnipeg in 1915, lived in Toronto for 50 years, immigrated to Israel in 1977, and died in Eilat on June 8, 2004.

Jack was the beloved soul-mate of Tova (nee Rosenvald) for 60 years, cherished father of Andy Barak and Sally Cozens and Cheryl and Tzvika Gaster, and treasured Saba of Shaharit, Liora, Mya, Enosh ז"ל, Jeremiah and Benny.

Jack's menschlechkeit, good humour, devotion to his family and to the State of Israel are just a fraction of his legacy.

If friends wish to make a donation in Jack's memory, the family requests they be made to the Enosh Gaster Memorial Fund, c/o 175 Ashdale Avenue, Toronto, ON M4L 2Y8

Osgoode students protest choice of convocation honoree

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

At least one Osgoode Hall law student decided not to participate in convocation ceremonies this year to protest the choice of recipient of an honorary doctorate from the school.

David Moull, who co-organized a "silent protest" instead, said he "didn't want to be on the same stage as Richard Falk," an international law professor at Princeton University who has been called an "anti-Israel extremist" by B'nai Brith Canada.

Allan Socken, incoming president of the York University school's Jewish Law Students' Association (JLSA), sent an e-mail to members the day before the June 18 ceremony to alert them about Falk's views.

A York media release had described Falk as "highly critical of Israeli policies" and said he served in 2001 on a three-person Human Rights Inquiry Commission for the Palestinian Territories appointed by the United Nations. Socken's e-mail included links to Falk's writings, including a defence of Palestinian "resistance to occupation [as] a legally protected right."

Following complaints from students, Osgoode Dean Patrick Monahan replied to them by e-mail on June 17, defending the choice of honoree. Monahan wrote that the complaints presented an "inaccurate, misleading and unfair characterization" of Falk's views.

He said that the Middle East has been a relatively minor aspect of Falk's scholarly work over the past 40 years, and that some of the items in question (like old ads by the Jewish Committee On The Middle East, an organization on whose advisory committee he is listed) "were neither written nor approved by" him. Among the comments were an allegation of Jewish control of the American president and the media.

Monahan wrote that he had spoken to Falk, who "is on record as opposing any form of deliberate violence directed at civilians, including suicide bombing."

"I understand the concerns of the students," Monahan told The CJN. "I've been reflecting on them and I want to take them seriously as we go ahead in future years."

The criteria for selecting honorees include things such as scholarship and contribution to public life, Monahan said. At Osgoode, faculty members nominate candidates, whose names are then circulated among them for comments. Suggestions are passed on to a committee of the university's senate, which makes recommendations to York president Lorna Marsden.

International law professor called 'anti-Israel extremist'

A deeper probe into a candidate's background might take place "if you don't know much about them," said Monahan, who was familiar with Falk's international law work "generally."

Among other recipients of honorary doctorates from York this year were Toronto philanthropist and businessman Saul Feldberg, and Fumiko Ishioka, director of the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre, known for her connection with the book Hana's Suitcase.

Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress and a professor of international law at the University of Toronto, said Falk was "a poor choice" for Osgoode, although his writings were "within the bounds of academic and legal debate."

In a letter to Monahan, Morgan wrote that CJC respects the school's "right to honour an individual with whom we happen to disagree. However, we do wish that, given the current divisive climate on campus, universities would select convocation speakers who role model an approach that is sensitive to the views of all sides of a complex dispute like the Middle East."

Michael Tweyman, who is entering his third year at Osgoode, was among a group of students distributing flyers at the ceremony, encouraging people not to applaud when Falk was honoured. Some audience members booed and one opened up a newspaper, while others walked out, witnesses said.

Falk's speech proceeded without incident following an introduction from professor Craig Scott, who said he hoped he could proceed "without misguided and shameful bullying."

Tweyman's classmate Deana Silverberg, said she's "a bit worried" about who might be honoured at future convocations and that, like Moull, she "would like an apology" from Monahan.

Graduating student Matthew Mostyn, a co-organizer of the silent protest, said he was "very disappointed" with Osgoode. Given the Mideast-related tensions on campus in recent years, there were "so many others [Monahan] could have honoured," Mostyn said.

Two killed, several hurt as Qassam rockets hit Sderot

By NIR HASSON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Two people, one of them a young child, were killed and at least nine others wounded Monday morning, when four Qassam rockets landed on the southern town of Sderot.

The fatalities were identified as Mordechai Yosopov, 49, and four-year-old Afik Zahavi, whose mother, Ruthie, was seriously wounded in the attack.

Emergency services reported that one of the rockets landed just metres from Yosopov, killing him on the spot.

Yosopov and Afik Zahavi will be buried Monday at the Sderot cemetery.

Since the start of the intifadah in September 2000, 347 Qassam rockets have been fired at Israeli targets, 265 of which have landed within the Green Line.

The wounded were rushed to Soroka Medical Centre in Be'er Sheva, where surgeons battled in vain to save the life of the four-year-old boy.

"There was a huge boom. I was very frightened and ran away," said Chen Smadja, 18, who was on her way to a nearby high school.

"Who is watching over [our children]? Nobody. That's my message to the prime minister," said Yitzhak Ohayon, Afik's father.

"We were supposed to go to his end-of-year party in kindergarten tomorrow… and now instead we'll be going to his funeral."

One of the rockets – fired by Palestinians in the Gaza Strip – landed close to a kindergarten in the Neveh Eshkol neighbourhood, and the second hit a nearby coffeeshop. The rockets landed just a kilometre from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's private ranch.

A third and fourth rocket landed in an open field shortly after the first two exploded, but there were no injuries this time.

Sderot has regularly been targeted by Palestinian militants. In most cases, the crude home-made missiles land in open areas. This is the first time a Qassam has led directly to an Israeli fatality.

"So far Sderot had been lucky in the Qassam attacks," cabinet minister Gideon Ezra told Israel Radio, "but that luck ran out today."

David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister's Office, told Ha'aretz that "the Palestinian missile attack was an especially cruel reminder of the brutal nature of Palestinian terrorism. Once again, terror has struck at innocent Israelis in the heart of an Israeli town."

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon held a two-hour meeting with security chiefs Monday afternoon to discuss possible responses to the attack.

The United Nations envoy for the Middle East, Terje Roed-Larsen, condemned the rocket attack.

Soldier killed in Gaza; helicopters hit Gaza foundries

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Staff Sgt. Roey Nissim, 20, of Rishon Letzion was killed and five other soldiers were wounded Sunday evening after a huge explosion in a tunnel beneath an army outpost at the Gush Katif junction in Gaza.

Early Monday, a few hours later, Israel launched two separate missile strikes at metal workshops in Gaza City. No major injuries were reported. Israel said the workshops were being used by Hamas and other terror groups to make weapons, including homemade rockets.

In the first strike, an Air Force helicopter fired three missiles at a workshop in the Zeitoun area of Gaza City, causing a small fire and some damage. Shortly afterward, helicopter gunships fired seven missiles at another foundry nearby. They lit up the night sky in and the explosions echoed across Gaza City.

Nissim was trapped under the rubble of the IDF post before dying of his wounds Sunday night. As of Monday morning, one soldier was in serious condition, one was in moderate condition, and two more were lightly wounded.

Palestinian gunmen fired guns and mortar shells at rescue forces as they attempted to evacuate the wounded from the site of the attack.

Both Hamas and the Fatah-related Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades claimed responsibility for the attack. A spokesperson for the Al-Aqsa Brigades said the group had dug a 350-metre-long tunnel, and detonated 150 kilograms of explosives underneath the outpost. The Israel Defence Forces is not yet certain where the tunnel originated, but army sources said it probably was in the area of Khan Yunis, whose northernmost houses lie some 300 metres south of the outpost.

"This is a message to [Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon that… our fighters will continue the holy struggle until we uproot them [Israelis] from our land," said the spokesperson, who gave his name as Abu Mohammed.

Two Palestinians from Khan Yunis, to the south of the outpost, were killed in clashes with Israeli troops shortly after the attack, Palestinian sources said. They said one of the Palestinians was a 12-year-old boy.

Hamas said the explosion came as revenge for Israel's assassination of the group's founder, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, in March, and of his successor, Abdel Aziz Rantisi, a month later.

Israel NATO 'partner'?

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ISTANBUL — NATO leaders have decided to upgrade relations with seven countries, including Israel, in the "Mediterranean dialogue" in a relationship defined as a "partnership."

The partnership with Israel, Jordan, Egypt and other countries in the region will enable these states to strengthen military relations with NATO and ensure invitations are sent to foreign ministers and defence ministers, along with top military figures, to NATO meetings.

The official version of the decision reached by NATO heads of state was to be released Monday in a statement summarizing the Istanbul Summit. As one of the decision's tangible results, an invitation will be issued to Israel's navy to take part in operations designed to prevent the smuggling of weapons and materials used to produce weapons of mass destruction.

NATO naval vessels and planes are taking part in these Mediterranean Sea operations, checking suspicious ships and stopping illegal activities. Anti-terror equipment, as well as gear to cope with natural disasters and the aftermath of terror attacks, will be made available to countries involved in this "Mediterranean dialogue" partnership.

The upgrading of relations represents another step toward making the Middle East and Central Asia the central theatre of NATO operations.

Hamas raps Arafat

Hamas criticized Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat saying he recognized Israel's right to be a Jewish state. Arafat told Ha'aretz he wants a state alongside Israel, based on the offer he rejected at the 2000 Camp David summit. A Hamas website accused him of betrayal. "Hamas strongly condemns the statements made by Yasser Arafat ..., which contain very dangerous views," the terror group said. "These positions represent new concessions" by Arafat, who "has given legitimacy to the expulsion of refugees in 1948."

Transfer gains support

Almost two-thirds of Israeli Jews believe Israeli Arabs should be "encouraged" to emigrate, a poll found. The Haifa University survey of 1,016 Israelis found 64 per cent said they favoured Arab emigration and some 55 per cent see Arab citizens as a threat to national security. Suggesting these views are linked to a two-state solution, 60 per cent said they wanted Israel to withdraw from the West Bank and Gaza.

Anti-evacuation edict

Top settler rabbis ruled last week Israeli security forces are forbidden to remove Jewish communities from the West Bank and Gaza. "No civilians, police officer or soldier is permitted to aid in the uprooting of communities," six Yesha rabbis said in a statement after a conference in Ma'aleh Adumim. The rabbis stopped short of calling on security forces to refuse evacuation orders as part of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to disengage from the Palestinians.

Burg to quit politics

Labor Party veteran and ex-leadership contender Avram Burg, 49, plans to quit politics and become a financial consultant, Israeli media reported last week. He resigned his Knesset seat on Sunday. Burg, a former head of the Jewish Agency who made headlines by leading talks on the "Geneva Accord," did not comment. He has reportedly accepted an offer to advise a U.K. investment firm.

Soldiers questioned

Military police last week raided the "Breaking the Silence" exhibit of photographs taken by soldiers during military service in Hebron, confiscating a folder containing newspaper clips about the exhibit as well as videotape with statements made by 70 soldiers about their experiences in the West Bank town. The four reservist soldiers who organized the exhibit also were summoned to interrogations by military police.

Israel-S. Korea Defence Ties?

Israel Aircraft Industries is participating in a joint bid to sell airborne warning and control systems to South Korea. The company wants to sell the Phalcon systems for $1.7 billion (US), the Israeli newspaper Globes reported. U.S. defence giant Boeing and Thales of France have filed rival bids.

Naomi Shemer, Israel's national folk singer, dies at age 74

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — It was a sign of the importance of Naomi Shemer to Israel's national psyche that the singer's death relegated the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to the inside pages of the nation's newspapers.

Saturday's death of Israel's national folk musician, at the age of 74 from cancer, spurred Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to open his weekly cabinet meeting with a eulogy and the Education Ministry to order all schools to spend an hour in classes recalling Shemer.

"Using marvelous lyrics and melodies, she succeeded in connecting us to our roots, to our origins, to the beginnings of Zionism," an emotional Sharon said at the cabinet meeting. "Today, when we part with Naomi Shemer, we bow our heads in sorrow and are grateful for the wonderful gift Naomi gave us."

Perhaps best known for her song Jerusalem of Gold, a paean to Israel's capital written shortly before Jerusalem's Old City was captured by Israel in the 1967 Six-Day War, Shemer penned and performed countless songs that captured the national mood and drew on her kibbutz upbringing.

Set to guitar, the melody of Jerusalem of Gold and its haunting descriptions of Jerusalem's ancient buildings resonated for Jews worldwide. In the Soviet Union, it inspired hope among Jewish refuseniks.

"It was the most Israeli thing we could think of, and we knew that in Israel the song had become something of a national anthem," recalled Natan Sharansky, a former Soviet political prisoner and now Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs.

Naomi Shemer as she appeared in the 1960's.

Al Hadvash Ve'al Haoketz (Of the Honey and the Bee Sting) spoke of the joy and sorrow that invariably intertwine in Israeli lives. In 1973, Shemer composed Let it Be (Lu Yehi) an Israeli version of the famous Beatles tune, to inspire optimism in a country demoralized by heavy losses in the Yom Kippur War.

Following the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, in 1995, Shemer translated American poet Walt Whitman's O Captain! My Captain! into Hebrew, put it to music and dedicated it to Rabin's memory.

The messages of Shemer's songs still hold currency in Israel today. Her songs enjoyed a revival in public sing-alongs after the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000.

Shemer won the prestigious Israel Prize in 1983, a year after speaking out against the government's evacuation of Sinai settlements as part of a peace accord with Egypt. The award was a sign her popularity spanned even fierce political differences.

Shemer was born in 1930 in Kibbutz Kinneret. She began playing piano at age 6 and was writing songs in her 20s.

She studied at music schools in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, but returned to her kibbutz roots in the army, spending her years of compulsory military service as a musical co-ordinator for shows put on by the Nahal Corps at new settlements and kibbutzim around the country.

She went on to write dozens of Israeli favorites, including All of These, or Al Kol Eleh, as well as numerous children's songs.

Her last work, composed as she was dying of cancer over the last two years, was a tribute to Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, who died in 2003 in the breakup of the space shuttle Columbia.

"The death of Naomi Shemer has for some years hovered like a little black cloud, a possibility, in the 'light blue yonder' about which she was composing even in her first songs," commentator Doron Rosenblum wrote in Ha'aretz. "And even back then, the occasional hint came up of a possible end, or parting one day from the light blue adventure of our lives in this land."

Shemer was buried Sunday evening at Kibbutz Kinneret, her birthplace, overlooking the lake that she wrote so many songs about. She asked that no eulogies be delivered at her funeral and that mourners instead sing three songs, including her famous Eucalyptus Grove, or Churshat Ha'Icalyptus.

After her death, Israeli President Moshe Katsav said, "In her songs, Shemer bequeathed us landmarks in the life of the country. Her songs voiced a great love for the state and the people of Israel."

Shemer leaves her husband, poet Mordechai Horowitz, two children and four grandchildren.

Despite obstacles, Herzl never gave up on his vision

Although he attained a law degree at 24, Herzl's career choice was writing, and in the next few years he published dozens of books, plays and articles, none of which had Jewish themes.

In 1891, the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, an influential newspaper, appointed him as its Paris correspondent. His move to France provided the first stimulus toward Jewish awareness. Anti-Semitism was, at that time, more intense in France than in Austria-Hungary, and Herzl sought to find a remedy. Thus, in 1892, he produced his first article on a Jewish topic, and in it he advocated assimilation as the best way to neutralize Jew-hatred.

Then came a bombshell. In 1894, the French military staged the trial of Capt. Alfred Dreyfus, and though solid evidence was lacking, the court found him guilty of treason and sentenced him to life imprisonment.

Herzl covered the proceedings as a journalist, but his feelings were far from aloof – especially since Dreyfus was an assimilated Jew like himself, and France, ostensibly an enlightened democracy, was the land of liberty, equality and fraternity. It was not the sordid miscarriage of justice that appalled Herzl, for at this stage the innocence of Dreyfus and the perfidy of the court was not yet fully established; Emile Zola's J'Accuse was not published until four years later. What affected Herzl with sickening force was the incredible sight of mobs spewing Jew-hatred and shouting, "Death to the Jews." Most of the press and clergy encouraged them, and in some instances Jews and Jewish property were attacked while police or soldiers watched approvingly. These riots occurred throughout France, and especially in Algeria, except in Algeria many Arabs offered the Jews protection.

All this changed Herzl and imbued him with a new outlook and a new mission in life. He now sought a radically different solution to the scourge of anti-Semitism and pogroms: The Jewish people needed to establish a political entity within territory that would be their own. That territory was to be in Palestine, their ancestral homeland.

Thus political Zionism was born, and to this cause Herzl henceforth devoted every fibre of his being. He now called Zionism "the Sabbath of my life," and his entire lifestyle changed. The tree that had previously adorned his home every December was replaced by Chanukah candles on a traditional menorah, and he attended synagogue more often.

An inescapable need in creating a movement for statehood was funding. He had never before done fundraising, but now, and for the rest of his life, he set out to solicit funds.

First, Herzl approached Baron de Hirsch, who, having already given millions to resettle Russian Jews in Argentina, was a natural prospect. He consented to see Herzl, but the meeting bore no fruit. Such frustration was to thwart him again and again.

At about that time, Herzl began to write a personal diary, which reveals much of what otherwise might never have been known. For example, he describes how ill at ease he felt in the presence of the powerful or wealthy – something that was not noticed, and not divulged by Herzl during his lifetime. He also discloses that already in 1896 his heart was seriously deteriorating.

To reach the Rothschilds, he sought first Albert, head of the Vienna branch. He asked a physician friend who was close to Albert to help arrange the meeting. When Herzl described the Jewish state he had in mind, the physician expressed the firm conviction that his dream was a symptom of mental stress. Presenting such a plan to the Rothschilds was out of the question, and he recommended rest and psychiatric consultation. It so happened that Herzl and Sigmund Freud lived on the same small street and passed each other frequently, but psychiatry was not on Herzl's agenda.

Undaunted, Herzl approached the London Lord Rothschild and other wealthy capitalists, and invariably the outcome was similar. The British chief rabbi was discouraging, too. The French Baron Edmond de Rothschild was the world's most generous supporter of agricultural settlements in Palestine, but he, too, rejected Herzl, and referred to him as "a dangerous adventurer."

An artist's composite of Theodor Herzl overlooking the walls of Jerusalem.

Each rejection was a painful experience, but the bitterest of all was the antagonism of his wife, Julie. She belittled his work at every step, and it was only shortly before his death that she finally showed any affection.

Come what may, Herzl never gave up. He merely adjusted his strategy. The Jewish aristocracy rejected him, at least for the moment, so he turned his attention to the ordinary man on the street.

Instead of courting the wealthy he addressed the Jewish masses. He did it by means of his gifted pen and his stirring oratory, and the success of these efforts proved astounding. In city after city, overflow crowds came to hear him, and his message generated intense public enthusiasm. He also succeeded in convincing key intellectuals of the validity of a Jewish state, including Max Nordau, Natan Birnbaum, Nahum Sokolow, Menachem Ussishkin, Chaim Weizmann and Israel Zangwill.

In 1896, Herzl published Der Judenstaat, in which he outlines his concept of a modern Jewish state in the biblical land. It generated wide admiration and also considerable criticism. A surprising feature is his failure to consider the Arab inhabitants, who in his day constituted more than 90 per cent of Palestine's population.

Also, that year, he announced the launch of an annual Zionist Congress, a form of world Jewish parliament, the first of which would be a three-day event to be held in Munich in August 1897. This announcement, much to his surprise, raised a storm of protest from influential Jews and organized Jewish groups. Secular Jewish leaders, for instance, felt that such public discussions were bound to generate anti-Semitism. Rabbinical groups resented what they interpreted as messianic aspirations, and Jewish newspapers predicted that the unrealistic talk of Jewish statehood would make the congress an object of ridicule.

The Rabbinical Council of Germany, Orthodox and Reform, issued a vitriolic protest, and the immediate impact was that the Jewish community of Munich withdrew its earlier invitation. So the congress had to be moved to a less hostile place, which turned out to be the tiny community of Basel. Jerusalem had been suggested, but that was ruled out by the Turkish government, and after World War I, by the British government.

The congress itself opened with recitation of the blessing Shehechiyanu recited in Hebrew. Thereafter, the language of proceedings and minutes was German. Some East European speakers tried to remake their Yiddish to sound like German, and the resultant dialect came to be called "Kongress-deutsch."

Lofty levels of intellect and dignity prevailed throughout the proceedings, and delegates were required to wear frock and white tie. Herzl himself was held in such high esteem that some greeted him, in all seriousness, as king of Israel. It is noteworthy that when he visited Palestine the following year, there were even Arabs who referred to him as Malik al Yahud (king of Jews).

An initial assessment would, however, deem that congress to be a disappointment, perhaps even a failure. More than 400 delegates had been anticipated, and less than 200 turned up. All leading rabbis, Orthodox and Reform, were invited, and not one actually came. Also invited were the world's Jewish bankers and industrialists, and the heads of major organizations – they also did not come. Of the world's significant Jewish newspapers, not one wrote approvingly of the "Basel program."

Yet the indefatigable Herzl wrote in his diary: "Here at Basel, I founded the Jewish state, and the world will recognize this within 50 years." History proved him right, although neither he nor anyone else could at that time have foreseen the contributing developments that were yet to unfold, such as the collapse of Ottoman rule and the rise of Nazi Germany. In 1947, 50 years after this entry, the UN voted for a Jewish state in Palestine.

At the second Zionist Congress, a trickle of rabbis, capitalists and heads of organizations attended, and with each subsequent congress the numbers grew. Press approval, likewise, rose. The sixth congress drew three times as many participants as the first.

It took years of despair until Herzl won over the Jewish aristocracy. It went faster with the gentile elite, and most of the statesmen he approached readily granted him interviews and then commended his proposals.

First was the grand duke of Baden, who introduced him to Kaiser Wilhelm II of Germany. Herzl also met with the kings of Italy and Bulgaria, the sultan of Turkey, the prime minister of Austria-Hungary and other statesmen. Even the interior minister of Russia received him warmly, but in that case the friendliness was misleading. Russian co-operation with Herzl was motivated by the czar's hope that Zionism might induce Jews to leave Russia.

The one decidedly cold interview was with Pope Pius X, whose sole expressed interest was the conversion of Jews. The strongest bond with any head of state was with the German kaiser, who met with Herzl three times in 1898. Germany and Turkey were close allies, and that year Herzl actively pursued a plan to set up a self-governing Jewish entity in Palestine under German-Turkish auspices. But the kaiser's ministers persuaded him to drop all contact with Herzl because the leaders of European Jewry, rabbis and bankers alike, showed so little interest at that time.

The one individual who had the full power to grant Herzl's request was the sultan, within whose empire Palestine lay. He hinted that, for a price, he might consider such a concession in Ottoman lands other than Palestine, but Herzl insisted that only Eretz Yisrael would do.

Herzl did, however, consider a British proposal for the Sinai Peninsula. The territory bordered on Palestine, so the idea was not entirely ruled out. But the lack of water, plus the emergence of other obstacles, killed that prospect.

In his discussions with British cabinet ministers, Herzl elicited a tangible willingness to seek territory where Jews could find refuge and govern themselves. Palestine was not theirs to offer, but in 1903 they came up with a suggestion for part of the extensive British territories in Uganda. Herzl rejected this outright, explaining that Zionism means the Holy Land – or at least adjoining the Holy Land – and nowhere else.

Then, in April 1903, the Kishinev pogroms struck, and the need to find an immediate place of refuge for Russian Jewry pressed upon Herzl with unrelenting urgency. He reversed himself, and at the sixth Zionist Congress that summer, he passionately pleaded for investigating the Uganda scheme. He stressed that it could be only a temporary plan to alleviate the current emergency and that Zionism must remain firmly committed to Zion. But he thought Uganda should be explored.

Opposition sprung forth like a thunderstorm, and this congress was the most rancorous to date. When the motion was put to the vote, two-thirds opted in favour, many voting that way primarily out of respect for Herzl. But 100 abstained, and those who had voted against, mainly delegates from Russia, rose and filed out. Herzl met with them later and managed to persuade them to return, which reflected the remarkable power of his personality. But the schism and the rancour remained, which was more than his ailing heart could take.

On July 3 , 1904, Herzl died, aged 44. The Zionist Congress continued to function along the lines he had established, and in 1948 it finally reached the goal he had set for it.

TISHA B'AV

Adapted from Gittin 55b.

This story takes place nearly 2,000 years ago when the Second Temple still stood tall on Mount Moriah in Jerusalem. That was back before last names were invented, so if someone's name was Aviezer, to avoid being mixed up with all the other Aviezers out there, they would add on "Bar Nosson," Nosson being his father's name. In fact, if someone's father had a name that was unusual enough, like Kamtza, he could end up just being called Bar Kamtza.

"Mr. Bar Kamtza?" called the liveried servant boy standing in the doorway.

"Yes," replied Bar Kamtza, coming to the door.

"You are cordially invited to a banquet tonight at the manor of Aviezer bar Nosson."

Bar Kamtza jumped. "Aviezer? Why would he want me to come? There must be some mistake. He hasn't spoken to me in years...ever since..."

"There's no mistake here," said the servant boy, checking the paper he was holding. "You are clearly written down as an honoured guest."

"It can't be...It can't be..." muttered Bar Kamtza.

"The banquet will begin two hours before sunset. Please be prompt." And with that, the servant boy ran off to the next house on his list, leaving Bar Kamtza to his troubled thoughts. "Maybe he's doing this to humiliate me," he wondered. "Or maybe someone else sent that boy here as a joke. Why in the world would Aviezer invite me? Unless...my father. He's friendly with my father. Maybe that's why he's trying to make up with me. Yes, that must be it. My father must have encouraged him to do this."

A few hours later, Bar Kamtza was strolling through the streets of Jerusalem, dressed in his finest clothes and singing to himself. What a relief. Finally, he and Aviezer weren't enemies any longer. Ah, here was Aviezer's manor now. Guests were streaming through the open doors into the large hall, which was all set up for the banquet. At the end of the hall, sitting at the head table, Bar Kamtza saw distinguished Rabbis. "Wow," he thought, "This is a very special banquet I've been invited to."

And just inside the door, greeting the guests, stood Aviezer.

"Aviezer," began Bar Kamtza. "Thank you so much for...." He froze. Aviezer was glaring at him with loathing and contempt.

"What in heaven's name are you doing here?" he hissed. The whole room fell silent.

"You...you...invited me," stammered Bar Kamtza.

"I invited you?" demanded Aviezer. "Mayer!" he shouted, and the message boy appeared. "Did you invite him?"

"You told me to."

"Bring the list!" thundered Aviezer, and the servant boy scurried to comply.

Aviezer skimmed through the list. "Idiot!" he bellowed, waving the list in the cowering servant boy's face. "Can't you read? It says Kamtza, not Bar Kamtza! I told you to invite his father! Get out of my sight now!"

The servant boy vanished. Aviezer turned to Bar Kamtza. "I was talking to you too."

"P...please, don't throw me out now that I'm already here. Don't embarrass me in front of all these people. Let me stay. I'll sit on the side and I won't cause any distractions. I'll even pay for my meal."

"Out!" roared Aviezer.

"Please!" begged Bar Kamtza. "I'll even pay for half of this banquet."

"Out!"

"I'll pay for the whole thing! Just don't do this me!" pleaded Bar Kamtza, but Aviezer grabbed him, and dragged him out the door.

The last thing Bar Kamtza saw was the rabbis sitting at the dais, watching wordlessly as Aviezer re-entered. Then the doors slammed shut, and a heavy clang told Bar Kamtza that they had been bolted.

He lay there, seething. Nobody had done anything to stop Aviezer.

No one had even said anything. Not even one of the rabbis. Mindless hatred erupted inside of Bar Kamtza. He stalked the alleyways of Jerusalem, his hatred growing fiercer and fiercer until...

"Your Majesty, the Jews are planning a revolt. If you don't stop them, they will attempt to rebel against the Roman Empire."

Caesar looked down at Bar Kamtza from his enormous throne, and chuckled to himself. "I'd like to see them try. But your information is valuable nonetheless. Thank you."

This story doesn't have a happy ending. The Roman army surrounded Jerusalem until they finally pierced the walls of the city, pillaging and burning everything in sight. On the ninth of the month of Av, (in Hebrew: Tisha b'Av) they set fire to the Temple. All that remains of the Temple is the Western Wall, (Kotel HaMaaravi), where even now, 2,000 years later, Jews from all over the world come to pray. The Jews of Israel were exiled to Rome, and were without a country until the founding of the modern State of Israel in 1948. The area where the Temple once stood was reconquered by Israel during the Six Day War in 1967. Tisha b'Av, the anniversary of the Temple's destruction, is still a day of mourning in the Jewish calendar.

Toronto architect to redevelop Shanghai's Jewish quarter

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Clifford Korman, the co-founding partner of the Toronto firm of Kirkor Architects & Planners, has been tapped to create a master plan for redeveloping the old Jewish quarter in Shanghai, China.

"It's a tremendous honour, a phenomenal project and a great opportunity," said Korman, a 53-year-old architect and registered professional planner.

Under the estimated $600 million gentrification scheme, upward of 50 historic buildings in the poor but colourful Hongkew district will be restored.

In addition, two commercial towers, three high-rise condominiums, a hotel and shops, comprising some four million square feet, will be built.

Consisting of about nine city blocks, Hongkew is a study in urban decay – a congested maze of dilapidated Victorian row houses, shops, temples and alleyways.

During the 19th century, Jews from Britain and Iraq settled in Hongkew, a Japanese enclave and extraterritorial concession.

Russian Jews feeling the pogroms of the 1880s and the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution subsequently arrived.

With the rise of Nazism in Germany, some 20,000 German, Austrian and Czech Jews streamed into Shanghai, an open city whose newcomers did not require visas or passports.

Shortly after the outbreak of World War II, the Japanese herded Jewish refugees into Hongkew, and there Jews created a self-contained, pulsating community.

Stores of all kinds and Viennese-style cafes sprouted. Newspapers, sports clubs, cabarets, theatres and self-help organizations were founded.

Jews began leaving Shanghai, contemporary China's commercial capital, following the war. The process was accelerated with the proclamation of the People's Republic of China in 1949. Today, Hongkew – but not greater Shanghai – is bereft of Jews.

Korman, a graduate of Bathurst Heights Secondary School and the University of Waterloo's School of Architecture, got involved in the redevelopment project due to his old friendship with a former classmate, Ian Leventhal, a frequent visitor to and admirer of China.

On one of his trips to Shanghai, Leventhal, an artist, stepped into Ohel Moishe Synagogue on Chang Yang Road. Built by Russian settlers at the turn of the 20th century, Ohel Moishe lost its relevancy with the departure of Shanghai's Jewish refugees. But today it is back in business again as a museum, the Jewish Refugee Memorial Hall.

Leventhal was so impressed by the unobtrusive beauty of the former shul that he, Toronto designer Tom Rado and others assembled a collection of Chinese and Canadian Jewish art – paintings, drawings and sculptures – to be housed in a space adjacent to the ground-floor sanctuary.

The collection, designed to highlight the relationship between Chinese and Jewish cultures, so impressed Shanghai city officials that they asked Leventhal and Rado to propose an original Jewish heritage project.

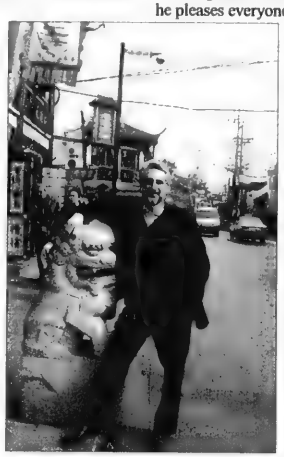
After coming up with the idea to remake Hongkew, the pair were invited to put together a team to study the feasibility of redeveloping that venerable neighbourhood.

Then they formed a company, Living Bridge, to raise funds for the project, and began interviewing internationally renowned architects, such as Moshe Safdie and Cesar Pelli, to see it through.

They settled on Korman – a member of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada – because he seemed like the ideal candidate.

Previously having worked in China, he was familiar with the country, and his reputation as a designer of luxury condominiums, hotels, retail plazas, industrial buildings and residential homes had preceded him.

"He has a modern touch, but he's wonderful at integrating," explained Leventhal. "A lot of architects will plunk their buildings down without much regard for the site. Hongkew is a sensitive and historic neighbourhood and it needs tender loving care."



Clifford Korman in Shanghai

Albert Warson, a Toronto-based journalist who writes about real estate and has known Korman for seven years, claims he possesses a magic touch.

"He is one of those architects who can whip off an architectural solution to a development problem, often on a serviette during a long flight or on a sheet of paper in a client's office. While it seems to spring off the top of his head, the solution is so insightful it invariably gets instant client approval."

Warson added: "He is also flexible enough to shift design gears abruptly if city planners and neighbourhood residents balk. In the end, he pleases everyone."

Korman, who is currently designing a master plan for a residential community in Beijing, believes his exposure to China will be extremely useful in the Hongkew project.

"It's very important that the architect have Chinese experience," he said in an interview shortly after returning from his latest trip to Shanghai.

As he sees it, the project will enhance Shanghai's cachet as a tourist destination and be a prototype for redevelopment in Shanghai and the rest of China.

That is important because, until now, old neighbourhoods have been ruthlessly levelled rather than lovingly preserved.

"The challenge is to balance restoration with intensification," said Korman, the father of two grown boys.

Korman will present officials with a final master plan in August, and he is confident it will be accepted. Once that hurdle is surmounted, developers will come into the picture.

He thinks real estate values will jump once construction gets under way in 2005.

And he expects Hongkew's character and socio-economic profile to be transformed as automobile traffic is restricted and the vast majority of its working-class inhabitants are relocated to make room for a new and affluent class of residents.

Lest the project be branded as elitist, Korman said that housing for lower middle-class dwellers will be built as well.

Korman, who has visited Shanghai three times in the past three months, believes China's potential is limitless.

"China is expanding by leaps and bounds. The Chinese are great capitalistic people. They draw on 5,000 years of history and culture. They're bringing 1.3 billion people into modern society and doing it at an accelerated pace. That's why they're searching for international professionals to give them guidance."

Born and raised in Toronto, Korman was drawn to architecture at a very early age. When he was five, he was already building tree houses and scrounging wood from his father Mike's lumber and construction business.

He graduated from the University of Waterloo in 1976, making the dean's honour list and walking away with the Ernest Wilby Memorial Fellowship for Architectural Excellence.

Joining the Zeidler Partnership, which designed the Eaton Centre in Toronto, Korman found himself working on designs for the Queen's Quay Terminal, the Glen Abbey Hotel, the Misssissauga General Hospital and the Rosedale Glen condominiums.

Having cut his teeth on these projects, he founded his own company, Clifford Korman Architect. The growth of his practice prompted him to merge with a rival firm, Steven Kirshenblatt Architect.

Kirkor Architects & Planners, the amalgamated company, has a long and varied list of clients, ranging from Loblaws and the Tridel Corporation to Menkes Development and the Camrost Group of Companies.

Korman and his associates have designed some of the finest condominium buildings in Toronto, including the Waterclub and the Riviera, and were also involved in the middle phases of construction of the expanded Bialik School.

Currently, they are working on the new headquarters of the Toronto International Film Festival and on the Zareinu school.

Their handiwork can also be seen in Israel. They designed the cadet training school in Be'er Sheva for the Israeli air force.

And now they are redesigning Hongkew. "We think it will be a very exemplary development," said Korman.

There's Jewish content out there at the Fringe

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Over the years, Toronto's Fringe Festival has developed and grown, and it now attracts more than 42,000 enthusiastic Fringers each summer to what has become the city's largest theatre fest.

The event has mushroomed to include 11 venues and more than 120 theatre companies from Ontario, Canada and around the world, and it's now the third largest fringe festival in Canada.

Here are some highlights of this year's Fringe, which runs until July 11.

•Barely Surviving My Jewish Family, written and performed by Sari Colt. Witness Colt's outrageous tales of growing up in an offbeat Jewish family. From her fashion-conscious mother to her prune-juice swilling father and her Playboy centrefold Hebrew teacher, Colt reveals all.

• Veteran actress Corinne Conley stars in Magda's Beauty Secrets, the story of a Polish survivor who worked as a slave labourer in Nazi Germany. Directed by Brenda Darling and written by Diane Forrest.

• In You Can't Live On Cute Forever, a (maybe not so) typical Jewish family are trying to live on cute. But when mother Ruth gets fed up, she leaves the family to cope on its own with daily living and Friday-night Shabbat rituals. The play explores this with humour and hope. Written by Jonathan Rothman and directed by Linda Matassa.

• The musical The Divine Heretic takes place in France after the burning of Joan of Arc. Her legend has deteriorated into a circus of salvation-peddling and Joan's mother Isabelle finds herself lost and confused. It's written by Tara Raquel Cates and Kevin Ralph Nelson.

•Schmigeggy presents Fable: Based On A True Story, by Adam Lazarus and directed by Jen Johnson. Retelling the Eden story from the point of view of God's unchosen, it features Adam, Eve, Lilith, the Snake and God.

•Exposed in High Park turns a normal day in High Park into an intriguing and outlandish spectacle sure to leave audiences guessing. Joshua Ginsberg's play is about the struggle for identity in a materialistic social system and looks at the value of art in such a world. Directed by Zenon Skrzypczyk.

• It's Not What You Think is actually two stories for the price of one, featuring two short plays, A Little Faux Pas, starring Guy Yarkoni, and The View From Here.

• Ellen Marlowe stars in Jack & Jill, a realistic and multicultural revision of the Mother Goose nursery rhyme. Directed by Jin Huh.

• Russell Bennett co-writes and stars in The Reefer Man, a play about choosing your own path in life, even in the face of legal and social censure. Bennett produced and directed the documentary Stoned: Hemp Nation on Trial, which was broadcast on CBC Newsworld in 1998.

• Kurt Schneiderman writes and directs a Funny Thing Happened On My Way To Shoot the Czar! A one-act play that features a cryptic tea party that hosts all of history's executed dictators.

•Cactus is a bizarre, anarchic, physically devised solo show which treads the line of comedy, theatre and performance art. Directed by Mark "Sabotage" Chavez and performed by Melbourne-based Jonno Katz.

TAPES, MEMORABILIA SOUGHT AS ASHKENAZ PAYS TRIBUTE TO HISTORIC YIDDISH RADIO SHOW

"Ershte Yiddisher radio shtunde ruft ois freyd" – "The First Yiddish Radio Hour Creates Joy."

So ran the headline in the Yiddish-language Kanader Nayes (Canada News) of April 1, 1936, as a locally produced Yiddish radio show began emanating over Ontario's air waves. At various times, such shows were produced in Hamilton and in St. Catharines, too.

A group of performers is planning to pay tribute to the era with a live show inspired by Ontario's own "Jewish Hour" broadcasts, to be staged at the Ashkenaz Festival over the Labour Day weekend at Toronto's Harbourfront Centre.

The live radio show will incorporate songs, interviews, singing "yinglish" commercials and comedy routines typical of the era, organizers say. The show is being directed by Theresa Tova, with musical direction by Martin van de Ven.

Performer Michael Mandel (otherwise an Osgoode Hall law professor) lends added authenticity to the show, since his father was Max Mandel, the "sweet singer of Yiddish folksongs" in the first Yiddish radio broadcasts almost seven decades ago.

Ashkenaz seeks the public's help in mounting an audiovisual exhibit to celebrate the era. The creative team is asking people to come forward and share their memories and memorabilia.

"We're hoping there still exist private recordings stored away in drawers and basements," Tova said.

For Toronto and Hamilton, Ashkenaz is looking for anyone connected with S. M. Greenfield's "Jewish Radio Hour" from CKOC, on air from 1936, Max Mandel and Sam Yuchtman's "Jewish Radio Show" on CKTB in the 1940s, or the Harry Harris Jewish Hour on CHML in the same period.

If you have photos, records, tapes of broadcasts or simply memories to share, please call the Ashkenaz festival office at 416-979-9901 or fax 416-979-4059. Or e-mail the festival at ashkenaz@ashkenazfestival.com or Tova directly at radiohour@theresatova.com

Isaac Bashevis Singer Centenary: The National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Ma., is hosting a conference this month to mark the 100th birthday of the celebrated Yiddish writer and Nobel-laureate, Isaac Bashevis Singer.

"The Imaginary World of Isaac Bashevis Singer" is a five-day exploration of Singer's remarkable stories, novels, memoirs and children's books. The conference features literary professor Justin Cammy, novelist Dara Horn, National Yiddish Book Center president Aaron Lansky, publisher Max Rudin, writer-editor Howard Schwartz, artist Isaiah Sheffer, filmmaker Kirk Simon, editor-professor Ilan Stavans and Singer's former assistant, Devorah Telushkin, whose memoir Masier of Dreams offers a riveting and intimate portrait of Singer.

The conference runs July 11 to 15. Contact program director Nora Gerard at 413-256-4900, ext. 116, or e-mail programs@bikher.org. website: http://yiddishbookcenter.org

Islam Behind Bars: No religion is growing faster in western prisons than Islam, especially in the United States, where there are more than 200,000 Muslim inmates, mainly black converts, seeking an alternative to Christianity. Prison officials took a benign view of the phenomenon before Sept. 11 but now fear their jails could become breeding grounds for terror. The CBC's Witness presents Islam Behind Bars, July 7, 8 p.m.

'Overnight guy' the youngest DJ at CHUM FM

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

A DJ in a city like Toronto typically gets his start living out of a suitcase, working at different small-market radio stations in towns most of us have never heard of.

But Rob Daniels was hired by CHUM FM while still in college, and at 20, he is the youngest DJ to work at Toronto's top radio station.

Daniels has been working the overnight shift since November 2003.

"I always had this passion for announcing. I wanted to be on the air," he said.

Rob Daniels

Daniels' teachers at Seneca College's radio broadcasting program warned him that trying to get a job as a broadcaster at a Toronto radio station was like trying to play for the Toronto Maple Leafs, but he decided to send audition tapes to two local stations "for fun."

When Rob Farina, program director at CHUM FM, called Daniels to talk about his "future goals and the possibility of [his] working for CHUM," Daniels went "berserk."

Eight months later, Daniels still has Farina's message saved on his answering machine. He can also recite, word-for-word, what Farina said to him at the end of their meeting.

"He said to me, 'You know what, Rob, I'm sick and tired of people saying that we're not hiring any new air talent in the city, and I'm about to change that.' I went crazy, my mouth dropped."

After his first shift on Nov. 1 at two a.m., Daniels was hired on a "trial by fire basis" and started working three overnights a week.

"I was going ballistic," he said. "It's not just any station, it's the number 1 radio station in Toronto."

During this time, Daniels was also taking eight courses at Seneca and working a shift at his high school radio station, where he got his start. "My whole life was upside down," he said.

Daniels got his start working at the high school station during lunch on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. He interned as a "phone guy" at KISS 92 two nights a week, answering phones and screening calls. He was later hired in the promotions department and went to events. During college, he interned at MIX 99.9, filing CDs, and worked in promotions at 97.3 EZ Rock.

"You have to be persistent," he said. "You can't just think everything's going to come to you."

While at Seneca, Daniels' drive and determination helped him achieve his goals. He set up a schedule for himself to send audio tapes to 20 medium-market radio stations, after every semester. He then asked each station for feedback and constructive criticism.

"It's all about paying your dues, and you really, really have to work your ass off. Believe me, this didn't just happen."

As a young man at a radio station with a core demographic of females aged 25 to 35, Daniels has to relate everything he talks about to this audience.

"Now I have to start watching programs like Friends or Oprah or Dr. Phil – whatever a 25-to-35-year-old female would watch," he explained.

Daniels said working the overnight shift isn't easy. He operates on a backwards schedule, has to set a curfew for himself and is constantly tired.

"Picture how you feel at 2:30 a.m," Daniels said. "That's how I sometimes feel at 5 p.m. or 6 p.m.

"The most difficult thing is having to go to sleep on a Saturday or Sunday morning when you see the sun just rising and it's going to be, like, 28 degrees."

Daniels now works the overnight shifts from Thursday to Monday.

He usually follows the same routine, sleeping from 7:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. He then wakes up, eats a light meal, goes for a run, takes a shower and spends time with his friends or his girlfriend until it is time for him to head back to the radio station.

"It's totally backwards, but that's how the radio life works," he said.

Despite a hectic schedule, Daniels still manages to sound energetic when he's on the air. He credits this to his love of the job and the music he plays.

"What keeps me so passionate about it is that when I go, I don't even sometimes consider it work. I look forward to going there and doing my show," he explained.

Making time for friends, family and a girlfriend can be quite difficult, Daniels said.

"I try to keep a steady balance. So far, the true people who mean a lot to me in my life have stuck by me."

Daniels said he hopes to go on a Birthright trip to Israel in the future, and looks forward to working a day shift. He also plans to do some sports broadcasting, preferably baseball, at some point in his career.

Although Daniels said he doesn't want to be known as the "overnight guy" forever, he understands that right now is the best time for him to do it.

"People will notice that you're working hard, and you just hope that one day you can move up."

Canada Day is a period to celebrate our Canadianism and show our pride in our country. I am frequently asked whether there are any good Canadian films out there.

In fact, quite a few good Canadian films have been released this past year, theatrically and on video. First let me mention two Canadian films with some Jewish content.

The Event is the story of a Jewish young man who has contracted AIDS. He knows he is dying and decides to end his life while he still has some control over his destiny. When the local assistant District Attorney hears of his death, she launches an investigation to determine whether a crime was committed and whether charges can be filed.

While The Event is a comedy, it provides a serious look at the topic of assisted suicides.

Another recent Canadian film with Jewish content is The Statement. Norman Jewison directed this story of a Nazi collaborator who was protected and given asylum after the War by church officials. Forty years later, French legal officials attempt to track him down in order to ensure that justice is meted out. Michael Caine stars as the villain in this film, the kind of role he rarely gets to play.

Other excellent Canadian films to be released on video over the past year include the following films: My Life Without Me won a well deserved Genie Award for Sarah Polley, who portrays a young mother who learns she has only a few months to live. Instead of feeling sorry for herself, she decides to use the time remaining to prepare her family for her death and to do some of the things she1s never had an opportunity to do.

Marion Bridge is a small Canadian film set in Atlantic Canada. Molly Parker returns home to join her two sisters for the short amount of time their mother has remaining. As the women re-unite after many years of separation, the dynamics between them re-assert themselves and we learn about the deep dark secrets they have refused to acknowledge for a long time.

Not all Canadian films are sombre affairs.

Mambo Italiano is a delightful comedy set within the Italian community in Montreal. Angelo is the only son of an Italian immigrant couple. The parents keep trying to introduce him to nice eligible Italian girls only to discover he is gay and living with a handsome Italian guy. It's funny and it's often outrageous, but it's great entertainment.

And if that doesn't make you laugh, try Seducing Doctor Lewis, a charming French Canadian comedy about a small village trying to persuade a doctor to relocate to their island so they can attract a new factory to their town and give the residents long-term and well paying jobs.

Or you could try Seraphim: Heart of Stone, a drama that took Quebec by storm and will satisfy everyone who likes a good love story.

The Triplets of Belleville is a rather unusual film. It was produced in co-operation with France and is an animated tale of a young bicyclist who is kidnapped, taken to North America and rescued by his grandmother. The animation is a throwback to the 1930s and 1940s and there is very little dialogue.

The Republic of Love tells about a late night radio talk show host who has trouble maintaining a lasting relationship. He has been married and divorced three times and he1s still in his 30s. He then meets someone new and the two fall in love, but this time it is the woman who has trouble committing.

Emile tells the story of an English university professor who has just retired from teaching. He is invited to receive an honourary degree from a university in Victoria, B.C. and decides to take the opportunity to visit a niece that he hasn't seen in many years. There are a lot of issues between them and slowly we learn the details of their shared history.

And coming up on July 13th is the video release of The Barbarian Invasions, which won the Academy Award this year for Best Foreign Language Film and received the Genie for Best Canadian film.

Rabbi Ari Enkin and his wife Shayna will soon be making aliyah with their children.

Winnipeg rabbi, family realize dream of aliyah

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Ari Enkin and his wife Shayna have long dreamed of making aliyah.

Now, they are making their dream a reality with the help of Nefesh B'Nefesh, an organization founded two years ago to encourage more North American Jews to make aliyah by removing the financial obstacles that often confront them.

On July 13, the couple and their children – Shira, 5, and Eitan, 1 – will be joining other North American olim at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York for their flight to Israel.

Rabbi Enkin and his wife are originally from Montreal. He served as the spiritual leader of the Orthodox Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton before coming to Winnipeg two years ago to become assistant rabbi at a synagogue in the city's south end. For the past year, he has doubled as the Hillel rabbi and rabbi in residence at the Rady Jewish Community Centre. He was the first Hillel rabbi here in about 25 years.

"This past year was Hillel's most successful year in a long time," Rabbi Enkin said. "More students reconnected with the Jewish community through Hillel last year than at any other time in recent history. We had more frequent programming and they were generally well attended. The Jewish presence at both the city's universities was resurrected."

But as much as Rabbi Enkin and his wife enjoyed living in Winnipeg, the pull of aliyah was stronger. "We are settling in Israel both for religious and political reasons," he said. "We believe that Jews should live independently in their own land. We should be masters of our own destinies. In the Diaspora, we observe Jewish history. In Israel, we make Jewish history.

"Aliyah is also our own personal response to the intifadah. Aliyah is the best answer to terrorism."

Citing several biblical references linking the People of Israel and the Land of Israel, he noted that "aliyah is the highest form of spiritual elevation from a Torah perspective."

He said the deciding factor in the couple's decision to make aliyah now is the existence of Nefesh B'Nefesh.

"In the first year, Nefesh B'Nefesh sent one planeload of new olim," Rabbi Enkin said. "Last year, it sent two planeloads. This year, 3½ planeloads are going."

In addition to financial assistance, Nefesh B'Nefesh's mandate includes assisting olim with social integration and finding employment. Its success rate so far has been 99 per cent, Rabbi Enkin said.

Although other Canadian Jewish families are flying out of JFK on July 13, the Enkins are the only family from Winnipeg.

They will be settling in Ramat Bet Shemesh, a new development located halfway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv and populated mainly by North Americans and South Africans.

Shayna Enkin will be opening a day-care in their home. As for Rabbi Enkin, he said he is open to offers of employment.

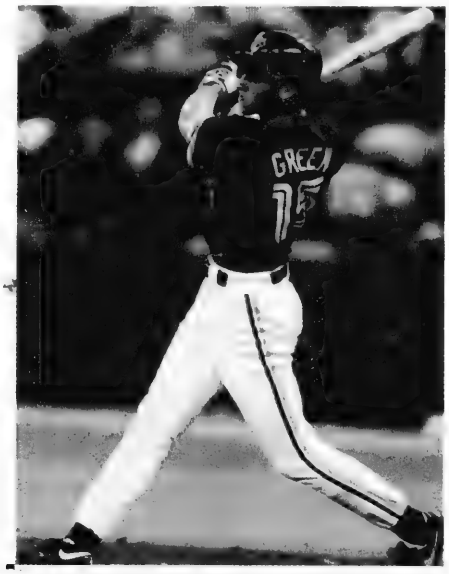
Ex-Blue Jay has 'a lot of good memories of Toronto'

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Shawn Green's recent return to SkyDome, five years after being traded to the Los Angeles Dodgers, coincided with him beginning to swing the bat again the way everyone in the baseball world knows he can.

Mired in a season-long slump at the plate, the career .284 hitter entered the inter-league series against his former Blue Jays club batting a paltry .228.

His average began to climb with his first at-bat, a double off the right-field wall, and he later homered off the right-field seats. He finished the three-game set five for 11, and by week's end, his average had risen to a much more respectable .250.



Shawn Green when he was a Blue Jay.

He followed up his success against the Jays by going five for 12 with a pair of RBIs in a series in Boston.

By mid-June, Green was hitting .317, leading Los Angeles to a share of the lead atop the National League West, tied with San Diego. By the 25th, the Dodgers and Green had slipped. L.A. was 2 ½ games behind San Francisco, while Green's average sat at .249.

"I have a lot of good memories of Toronto, so it's fun to be back," said the 6-4, 200-pound first baseman, who was drafted out of high school by the Blue Jays, 16th overall, in 1991.

"I've been struggling, so it's nice to get back to a place that I played so many games in."

The 31-year-old was dealt to the Dodgers in November 1999 after spending the first nine years of his career in the Blue Jays system. At the time, the club couldn't afford to keep both him and his good buddy, Carlos Delgado.

In the season prior to being dealt to L.A., he hit .309 with 42 homers and 123 RBIs, and he won a golden glove for his play in right field.

He promptly signed a six-year, $84 million (US) deal with the Dodgers, which at the time was the second-richest contract in baseball history.

Green, a native Californian, was raised in a distinctly non-observant home and received no formal Jewish education during his childhood. He remained detached from Judaism until he became an adult.

In fact, Green may never have given his heritage any thought whatsoever had he not achieved star status. He said he learned more about his religion during the time he spent in Toronto than in the preceding 22 years. Green also attended High Holy Day services for the first time in his life during his tenure with the Jays.

Wherever he plays, Green said, there's always Jewish people reaching out to him.

He gained a great deal of respect in the community a couple of years ago by deciding to sit out a game on Yom Kippur, even though the Dodgers were in the middle of a pennant race.

Green, a member of the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Los Angeles, was given the Hank Greenberg Sportsmanship Award earlier this year by the American Jewish Historical Society.

"It's a big honour, because he was such a great player and Jewish figure in American history," said Green, whose family name was shortened from Greenberg by his grandfather.

On the field, Green's home run total dropped to 19 in 2003 following back-to-back seasons in which he hit more than 40. The decrease in his power numbers was a result of playing the year with a right shoulder injury he suffered in spring training.

He underwent surgery to repair the shoulder during the off-season. Green said the shoulder is not like it was a couple of years ago, but that it isn't affecting his play on the field.

However, through his first 68 games of the 2004 campaign, Green had hit just nine balls out of the park.

Stable owner's filly wins stakes race

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

FORT ERIE — The rapid ups and downs of horse racing are summed up by the old adage, "Chicken today, feathers tomorrow."

One recent Sunday was a "chicken day" for the Shoestring Stable of Dr. Jerry Edelist of Toronto as the stable's lone horse, the plain bay, four-year-old filly Dressed For Action won the $141,470 Adena Springs Matchmaker Stakes.

In addition to $48,000 in prize money and breeding awards, Dressed For Action, the race favorite, also won a free breeding with Preakness winner Red Bullet worth $30,000 (US).

But for most of the year, it's been "feathers" for Edelist, professor emeritus in the University of Toronto medical school's department of anesthesiology:

"I've been a thoroughbred owner for 30 years, but never have owned more than three horses. This year Skier's Gift won a nice allowance race in Florida, then suffered a career-ending leg injury in his next start.

"Two weeks ago, my two-year-old died of a rare heart ailment. Dressed For Action [who now has four wins, five seconds and one third in 14 lifetime starts and more than $340,000 in earnings] is my only runner."

The race followed form as Dressed For Action, ridden by Woodbine regular Ray Sabourin, and Miss Kitty Hawk, ridden by Brazilian native Enrico Rosa Da Silva, broke on top and duelled for the lead.

Dressed For Action put away that rival and drew clear in the homestretch, zipping the five furlongs in :58.2. It was the first race of the year on Fort Erie's turf course. The winning margin for the 5-2 favorite was a length-and-a-half.

Fort Erie-based Soon To Be Single (ridden by Brian Bochinski) came on to finish second in her first start of the year for trainer Lynn Simon. Another Woodbine-based horse, Leading Role (jockey Neil Poznansky) was third. She was fourth in the race a year ago.

"This filly loves the turf," said assistant trainer John Mattine. "She was second to the boys in the Bold Ruckus Stakes last year, then came back three weeks later and won the Ontario Damsel Stakes. She'll probably come back here to run in the $125,000 Rainbow Connection Stakes July 25."

Sabourin said his mount broke alertly, adding, "I was just a passenger until I asked her for speed as she turned for home. It's pretty easy to ride those kind."

Soon To Be Single won a free breeding to two-time Santa Anita Handicap winner Milwaukee Brew, valued at $15,000 (US). Gold Case ($7,500 US) will be the mate of Leading Role. All three stallions are owned by the Adena Springs Farm of entrepreneur Frank Stronach.

שליחותו של הממונה על משאבי אנוש מאת: א.ב. יהושע, הוצאת הקיבוץ המאוחד, 2004

הכול מתחיל בפיגוע. אישה כבת ארבעים, שלא נשאה עימה שום מסמך מזהה פרט לתלוש-משכורת קרוע ומוכתם ממקום עבודתה - מאפייה גדולה ומפורסמת, נפצעה אנושות בפיגוע בשוק ירקות. היא נאבקת יומיים על חייה מבלי שאיש יתעניין בשלומה. "וגם אחרי מותה היא שוכבת אלמונית ולגלגדתה במדור-המתים של בית-החולים." אחד המקומנים מאיים לפרסם כתבה מאשימה תחת הכותרת: חוסר-אנושיות מזעזע אצל יצרני וספקי הלחם שלנו. לכתבה משובצים שני תצלומים, המזהים בבירור את האחראים להתעלמות מגורלה של העובדת; האחד הוא בעל-המפעל, והשני הוא של הממונה על כוח-אדם. בעל המפעל הקשיש מזעיק את הממונה על משאבי אנוש למנוע את ההשמצה ולתקן את העוול שנעשה לעובדת הזרה שנראה שאפילו הפיצוץ שהרגה לא פגם ביופיה הנדיר. (על עטיפת הספר דיוקנה האיקוני של אישה – פסל של פרנצ'סקו לאוראנה (1940).

תיאור אחד שובה לב הוא חנייה של הממונה והמשלחת המתלווה באיזה בסיס צבאי במדינה הזרה אי-שם במזרח אירופה. פעם, בימי המלחמה הקרה היה זה מקום מקלט צבאי-גרעיני, במעמקי האדמה. היום הפך המקום השומם לאכסניה-מוזיאון. במקלט זה שוכב גיבורנו מכורכל כתינוק בקרבת הארון שבו מונחת גופת האישה ולצידו בנה שהגיבור מהופנט מיופיו.

המצבים שא.ב. יהושע מדמיין כמעט סוריאליסטיים. חלקם סיוטים, חלקם מבוימים כקומדיה של טעויות. שיאה של "הקומדיה" הוא בסוף הסיפור כאשר לאחר כול תלאות הדרך מסתבר שהאם הזקנה של ההרוגה "כעסת שגרמנו אותה מירושלים, במקום לקבור אותה בעיר ששייכת גם לה."

שליחותו של הממונה על משאבי אנוש איננו מר מאני ואף לא המאהב. אך המסר חשוב. א.ב. יהושע הצהיר בעקבות הופעת הספר כי מטרתו הייתה לתת למנות ואירועי הטרור פנים ומימד אישי. אכן יש חשיבות לעובדה שרק לאישה המתה יש שם בסיפור: יוליה רגאייב. לכל הדמויות האחרות אין שם. זו צורת מחאתו של יהושע על השלמה עם מצב אימתני והתרגלותנו לנהל את החיים בצל אלימות המוות.

MANGO BROCCOLI SALAD

1 pkg. (16 oz.) frozen broccoli florets
1/4 cup low-fat mayonnaise
1 tblsp. rice or other mild vinegar
1 tsp. sugar
1/2 cup chopped mango or mandarin oranges
1/4 cup walnuts, pecans or cashews

Steam or microwave broccoli until tender-crisp. Drain and chop into bite sized pieces. Stir together mayo, vinegar and sugar, then add to broccoli and stir to coat all pieces. Add mango and nuts; stir lightly to combine. Chill. Serves 8.

Money Matters

Interesting times

Rabbi Jay Kelman

The biblical prohibition against charging interest seems to be out of place today. Interest rates are crucial to our economy. Too high and the economy is stifled, too low and inflation runs amok.

Without interest, homeowners would be few and far between – what bank would offer a zero per cent mortgage? – and business could not get the capital it needs to create wealth for all. Simply put, we would all be much poorer. So how could the Torah ban such an important financial tool? Furthermore, the Torah's laws of interest seem discriminatory, as interest is forbidden only on loans between Jews.

Yet it is precisely because charging interest is not immoral – it can even be praiseworthy – that one may do so with a non-Jew. All moral wrongs, be they tax evasion, offering inappropriate advice, price fraud or misleading advertising, are prohibited irrespective of the victim's religion. These may, in fact, be even more grievous sins if perpetrated against a non-Jew.

The charging of interest, however, is a ritual prohibition, not a moral one, and thus applies only between Jews. It is a prohibition not only between men but also between man and God. Apparently the Torah expects, even demands, that we bestow special favours to our brethren. We must give up small amounts of profit to help those in need by granting an interest-free loan.

However, favours have their limits. The Torah did not demand, though the rabbis did recommend, that we not charge interest to non-Jews either. In the modern era, loans are no longer for a few shekels, but are often in the thousands, if not millions, of dollars. No one would, or even could, lend that kind of money without an expectation of some return.

Furthermore, many loans today are not given to help the struggling poor but to help relatively wealthy people prosper. A legal mechanism (heter iska) was developed by our rabbis that allows many types of loans to be structured as part of a business venture allowing for payment of "profit" in place of "interest." This legal loophole, to be used only in times of true economic necessity, allows us to be faithful to the Divine, eternal laws of the Torah while being responsive to the realities of the modern-day economy.

Quiet Jewish goodness in T.O.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I met a man in the Toronto Jewish community, Phil, who gives half his meagre salary to a poor Jewish woman living in a small town, for her rent and food. (The Canadian Jewish community is not set up to assist poor Jews living outside metropolitan and federated communities).

Last week, I met a Jewish woman, Miriam, who volunteers at the Hospital for Sick Children on a weekly basis by dressing up like Superwoman and entertaining children suffering from illnesses that God felt were important to create in our world. She's been doing it for a long time.

In a discussion with my friend Bert, he mentioned that when he meets an Arab or a Muslim along his sales route, he makes a concerted effort to befriend them. He describes this as his way of "bringing peace to the Jewish people and the world." I told a few people. They said they do the same.

Last Shabbat, one of my brother-in-laws humbly stated that he will complete the entire Shas – every tractate in the Talmud – in March, together with thousands of other Jews around the world. Every morning, for the last seven years, they have studied a different page of Talmud in a program called Daf Yomi (a page a day). This is a huge task!

My friend Rebecca tells me stories about her Sephardi shul. Once, the shul's members became guardians of a young man who had come here from Israel to study. Rebecca's family accepted him into their home for close to two years.

In May, I was talking to Hadassah, a graduate of Ulpanat Orot High School about an article I wrote called "The Walking Man" (about Naftali Mernick, who spends his days walking the streets). Hadassah told me that whenever she sees Naftali, she says hello to him in her head, because "he is an important member of our community." Later, a colleague told me he does the same. Apparently a lot of folks do.

I was privy to a story last weekend, about a local South African Jewish family who invited a friend of their son to live in their home, away from an abusive environment. The mother accepted him as one of her own children. The teen is not Jewish. He lived with them for five years.

We have a high profile Jewish community member who adopted a native child, raised her and gave her a life.

At a committee meeting in May at Ve'ahavta (where I am director), I found out that two of my volunteers pay the mortgage of another family who have fallen on bad times. They also sent the family on a vacation last year, preventing them (my volunteers) from taking one of their own.

I know a little girl from an affluent Jewish home who insists that her entire family climb into their car at least once a week with sandwiches and warm clothing (in the winter) and travel the streets of Toronto to help the homeless and needy.

I have a friend who donated very expensive and frilly brassieres to a women's shelter. When I asked her why, she said she did it because the "girls had very little and I wanted them to feel beautiful."

There is a man in the Toronto Jewish community – Norman Epstein – who remembers that "we were slaves in Egypt" and hates that slavery exists in Sudan today. He is sickened by the murder of two million Sudanese and the ongoing ethnic cleansing and genocide. In response, he started up C.A.S.T.S – Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan. His website is www.geocities.com/castsudan.

'Wait and see' mode on Liberal minority

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a vote to elect Canada's 38th parliament last week, the Liberal party continued its stranglehold on ridings in Montreal and Toronto, home to the country's two largest Jewish communities.

In the Greater Toronto Area (GTA), Liberals were elected in Eglinton-Lawrence (Joe Volpe), York Centre (Ken Dryden), Willowdale (Jim Peterson), Thornhill (Susan Kadis) and St. Paul's (Carolyn Bennett) – all ridings with a substantial Jewish populations.

In Quebec, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler received 76 per cent of the vote to be returned handily as the MP for Mount Royal, while government house leader Jacques Saada and backbencher Raymonde Folco were re-elected in, respectively, Brossard-La Prairie and Laval-Les Iles, north of Montreal.

Prime Minister Paul Martin [RNS/Reuters photo]

In Winnipeg South Centre, another area with a substantial Jewish population, Liberal Anita Neville was returned as MP, while NDP candidate Judy Wasylycia-Leis took Winnipeg North.

Although Liberals in the GTA and Winnipeg South won their ridings with ease, Tory candidates took consolation in narrowing the margin from 2000 and in laying the groundwork for future contests.

Supreme Court approves condo sukkot

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

In a 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court has ruled that Orthodox Jews living in a luxury condominium complex in Montreal have the right to set up a sukkah on their balconies during Sukkot, even though their contract prohibits construction and decoration on the balconies, which are part of the buildings' common property.

The B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, which was a co-party in the case, hailed the judgment as "a landmark ruling that upholds the right of all Canadians to follow their religious practices without interference by the courts."

Landmark ruling upholds religious rights

The proviso is that the sukkot must not be up for longer than the nine days of the holiday, and their structure must allow for a passageway in case of emergency and conform, "as much as possible, with the general esthetics of the property."

The high court says the trial judge erred in basing his decision on conflicting expert testimony by two rabbis (Moise Ohana for the six Jewish claimants and Barry Levy for the co-owners' association) on whether having one's own sukkah was an obligation of Judaism.

Essentially, the Supreme Court says religious belief is personal and does not have to be backed up by an official dogma or religious authority, and therefore requiring expert opinions was inappropriate.

New UJA Director

OTTAWA — London, Ont., native Jack Silverstein has been named director of United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa and the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation. Silverstein most recently served as director of gift planning with the Ottawa Hospital Foundation, where he managed a $100-million legacy campaign. Before that, he worked for Carleton University and the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens' Organizations.

Imam Convicted

CLEVELAND — A U.S. federal court last month convicted a Palestinian-born imam here of lying about his ties to Palestinian Islamic Jihad and other terror groups when he became a U.S. citizen in 1994. Fawaz Damra, imam of Ohio's largest mosque, faces five years in jail, deportation and loss of citizenship. Jurors were shown video footage of Damra raising money for Islamic Jihad and calling Jews "the sons of monkeys and pigs." Sentencing is set for Sept. 9. Damra's lawyers said they would appeal.

Germany Sued Over Art

NEW YORK — A U.S. group is suing Germany for $18 billion (US), alleging it is hiding artworks stolen during the Holocaust. The lawsuit against the German finance ministry was filed in New York by the Association of Holocaust Victims for Restitution of Artwork and Masterpieces. The group's lawyer said German officials conspired to store, transport, withhold or dispose of at least 2,000 artworks taken from Holocaust victims. Germany countered that since the war's end, it has returned more than one million works to their owners or heirs, but still owned some insured for some $73 million.

New N.Y. Kosher Law

ALBANY, N.Y. — New York's state senate passed a new kosher law last week. The law was made necessary when the state's previous law was declared unconstitutional after a lawsuit arguing that the state agency involved in kashrut – administered by Orthodox Jews – had crossed the line from consumer oversight into unconstitutional religious entanglement. The bill still needs Governor George Pataki's signature before it becomes law.

Arabs Threaten Boycott

DAMASCUS — Arab states have threatened to boycott Caterpillar if it continues to sell bulldozers to the Israeli army. Pro-Palestinian activists have criticized Caterpillar because Israel uses its bulldozers to destroy what it says are terrorists' homes. "Your insistence to go on supplying the Israeli army… would eventually lead to halting any dealing with your company by all Arab countries," the Damascus-based Arab office for the boycott of Israel said in a letter. Caterpillar dismissed the threats, saying it can't police the use of its equipment. Its shareholders recently rejected a proposal to stop doing business with Israel.

SS Man May Avoid Jail

BERLIN — Germany's high court voided the jail sentence of former Nazi Friedrich Engel, 95, saying he is too old to be retried to clear up doubts about the original verdict in his case. In 2002, Engel, the ex-SS chief of Genoa, Italy, was sentenced to seven years for organizing a wartime massacre and shooting 59 Italian prisoners in 1944. Engel could still face jail under a new European Union regulation because he was sentenced to life in 1999 by an Italian military court for his role in 246 murders, the high court said.

Cemetery Desecrated

DUSSELDORF — German police are seeking leads in the desecration of the Ulmenstrasse Jewish cemetery in Dusseldorf after swastikas and SS symbols were found June 24 on 45 headstones.

94-year-old B'nai Brith Lodge Disbands

VANCOUVER — It was the end of an era last month for B.C.'s Jewish community when the 94-year-old B'nai Brith Lion's Gate Lodge voted itself out of existence.

Less than a dozen of its 30 paid members were present at the lodge's annual general meeting for the unanimous vote to dissolve the group, the Western Jewish Bulletin reported.

Although the membership-based lodge and its more social aspect is gone, its activist mandate has been transferred to the B'nai Brith Foundation of British Columbia, which will continue to fight hate, provide community service awards and support the Interfaith Brotherhood multifaith initiative, lodge president Rivka Arieli told the Bulletin.

B'nai Brith has had a presence in British Columbia since 1910, when the Samuel's Lodge #668 was formed. In 1985, it merged with Lion's Gate Lodge #1716, which was formed in 1948, to become Lion's Gate Lodge #668.

The lodge, which was not directly linked to B'nai Brith Canada, was an arm of B'nai B'rith International's Evergreen chapter, which covered Alaska, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Washington and B.C. As part of the new restructuring, Lion's Gate members will be encouraged to join B'nai Brith Canada, the international group or both, the Bulletin reported.

Jewish community 'is about volunteers'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Judaism teaches us to reach out and help others, both in our own community and beyond, agreed a panel of speakers at a recent town hall meeting sponsored by The CJN.

On the panel, titled "We are Our Brothers' Keepers: What It Means in Practice," were Linda Levi, assistant executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee; Susan Jackson, director of community planning, continuity and culture with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; and Avrum Rosensweig, founder and director of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Levi, who oversees the JDC's worldwide planning and budgeting process, said our heritage includes a long history of social justice, and it's our challenge to live up to these moral principles.

In her work at the JDC, she has visited Jewish communities throughout Israel, the former Soviet Union, eastern Europe, Africa and Asia, and that has helped put her own life in perspective, she said.

In the former Soviet Union, where pensioners have become impoverished due to tremendous economic changes, she has seen many people who can no longer afford to put food on their table.

"Their safety net collapsed, and JDC became a lifeline to these people. Many of them would have died if no one had been there to help them.

"There are 240,000 elderly people in 2,600 localities across the former Soviet Union, [the same places from which] many of our own ancestors come. We all have the same roots. They are our brothers."

In Buenos Aires, there is a new class of Jewish poor, and 36 children from the community die from hunger every day, Levi said. "The middle class has [become] impoverished, and we must provide the welfare services needed."

The JDC has also reached out to the Jewish community of India, which had been cut off from the rest of the Jewish world because of distance, she said.

It has established an array of Jewish programs in a country that had no formal Jewish schools or trained educators, Levi said. "Over a period of 10 to 15 years, we have created a miracle. We have created a facelift of Jewish life."

Taking part in the recent town hall meeting were, from left, Avrum Rosensweig, Linda Levi and Susan Jackson. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

'A lucky, beautiful thing'

From the editor's desk

The first question I asked Laura Condlin, the engaging young Stratford actor, is what happened to the vowel in the second syllable of her last name?

With a chuckle and a playful response, she acknowledged that the "missing" vowel was indeed a conversation piece and a sore spot with government and other bureaucratic officials but owed its eccentric spelling to its Welsh etymology.

Though she is only 26 years old, this is Condlin's third season with the celebrated company, where she appears in Timon of Athens, Cymbeline and King John. Her previous Stratford credits include King Lear, Antony and Cleopatra, Troilus and Cressida, The Taming of the Shrew and The Scarlet Pimpernel.

"Coming here [to Stratford]," Condlin enthused, "has been the best thing ever."

Sounding more like a veteran of many decades on the stage than a young, relative beginner, Condlin elaborated on her feelings at being part of the Stratford troupe. "I am totally excited to be here and totally terrified. And that's one of the beautiful things. You don't have to get over the fears and the butterflies. The adrenaline feeds you."

That actor's adrenaline has been coursing through Condlin's veins for most of her life. Born in Toronto, she took her first "formal" steps toward a life on stage when she was nine years old. Her family enrolled her in the Claude Watson School for the Arts in Grade 4, and she studied there until graduation from Grade 13.

"From my earliest days in school," Condlin recalled, " I always wanted to be part of the [play] productions. That was true in elementary and high school. I was totally unafraid of trying to be creative."

How she became that way – unafraid to stand before an audience, performing, acting, singing, making music – she attributed to her parents, as did her young colleagues last week and as have other young actors with whom I have spoken about their careers.

"My parents were so supportive and so encouraging," Condlin said of her early affinity for the stage and her curiosity to pursue an acting career.

Condlin and her mother were constant symphony-goers. "There was always music in our house," she said. Her mother enrolled her at an early age to learn violin according to the Suzuki method. Indeed, the confidence and assurance that developed in rhythm with her musical skills helped to ignite Condlin's yen for the stage.

"My parents never overshadowed the fact that I loved theatre and the arts. Their only caution to me was that I not close any doors for my future."

After high school, Condlin's future unfolded at the University of Windsor where she received a bachelor of fine arts degree in theatre.

The four-year program was quite a grind.

"Between classes, studying, auditions, workshops, rehearsals and performances, it was a 50- to 60-hour schedule each week for four years. The days and weeks were long, but ultimately so rewarding."

During our conversation, Condlin's enthusiasm never waned, even when she recalled the "sheer exhaustion of the schedule of putting to work on stage in the afternoons and evening what we learned in class during the day."

When Condlin described some of the formative experiences in her early life, she dwelled especially long on her bat mitzvah, which was a shared ceremony with other bar and bat mitzvah celebrants at her Hebrew school.

Laura Condlin

The dvar Torah, she recalled, "was about how important my Judaism was to me." It is part of her identity that she proudly affirms.

As with other interviewees, I also asked Condlin if she had any words of advice to impart to CJN readers of her generation and younger, who are curious but hesitant perhaps about pursuing a career on stage or any of the far-off dreams that animate their souls.

"My life is a lucky, beautiful thing," Condlin said. "If it's in your soul," she unhesitatingly offered, "you have to do it. Don't be shy. Make sure you try."

Stratford, it seems, offers us a great deal this year. – MBD

Markham struck by anti-Semitic graffiti

'York Regional Police regards any hate crime with abhorrence'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Three months after unknown vandals daubed Nazi graffiti on homes and cars in Vaughan, the Town of Markham was subject to a similar attack last week, with police recording more than 25 anti-Semitic messages and symbols in the Kennedy Road/Highway 7 area.

Businesses, residences, vehicles, fences and roadways in the largely non-Jewish neighbourhood were hit, York Regional Police said. The initials "RNC" were also painted inside a gazebo located at Main and Victoria streets and railway property was also defaced.

York Regional Police Chief Armand La Barge said the force takes the incident very seriously.

"York Regional Police regards any hate crime with abhorrence," he said in a news release. "We take great pride in the diversity of our region and I am saddened when such incidents undermine one of our greatest strengths. We will continue to work diligently to identify the authors of this crime and bring them to justice. I am urging members of the public to come forward with any information."

Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said last week's acts of vandalism are similar to the ones in Vaughan that took place between March 14 and 15 and could be the work of the same people or copycats.

As was the case in the spring, a swastika was drawn improperly, he said.

"This was a crime of hate. It was an attempt to intimidate. The Nazi swastika is the worst and most evil of symbols. Whether Jews are in the area is irrelevant."

Farber said said some of the victims in Markham were Chinese and Iranian, and they "feel as vulnerable to attack as anyone else. We understand their pain."

Farber said Congress will "reach out to other communities" in an upcoming meeting of York Region's Police Chief Advisory Board. Congress, along with other multicultural communities, is represented on that board, he noted.

Anyone with information about the vandalism in Markham or the earlier acts in Vaughan is asked to call 1-866-876-5423, ext. 7441 or ext. 7541, or Crime Stoppers at 1-800-222-TIPS.

A $10,000 reward remains in effect for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the March incidents.

Jewish leaders 'saddened' by decision not to renew Fantino's contract

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish community leaders say they're "saddened" that the Toronto Police Services Board has decided not to renew Police Chief Julian Fantino's contract when it expires next spring.

Joel Richler, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region chair, said the chief has been a "very good friend of the Jewish community" and "more importantly, the community has confidence in him."

Fantino was personally involved in the investigation into the murder of David Rosenzweig two years ago, and played a prominent role this past spring when Jewish graves were desecrated and community sites were hit with anti-Semitic graffiti, Richler said.

"He was sensitive to the needs of minority communities and to anti-Semitism in particular. We are sad to see him go," Richler said.

Bernie Farber, executive director, CJC Ontario region, said he met Fantino when they sat together on the old North York race relations committee about 20 years ago, and since then have they been friends "on a number of levels."

"I believe him to be a true 'cop's cop.' He brought a sense of security, comfort and support to the Jewish community at a time when we needed it, and he has done a great deal to improve inter-ethnic relations. He was well-respected."

But Farber said that "police chiefs have come and gone, and we have always had their support. There has never been a police chief [with whom] we did not have good relations."

Toronto woman grieves for 'miracle' nephew

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Ruthie Zahavi, a resident of the southern town of Sderot, Israel, altered her daily routine one morning last week, her whole life changed.

After taking her son, Afik Zahavi-Ohayon, 3½, to the doctor before dropping him off at kindergarten, Zahavi was seriously wounded and Afik was killed when four Qassam rockets exploded near them. Also killed in the attack was Mordechai Yosopov, 49.

Afik's aunt, Eti Ohayon, who has lived in Toronto for 25 years, says that if it were not for that routine doctor's appointment, "they would have been walking to school one hour earlier, and maybe none of this would have happened. It was fate."

Afik, the only child of Zahavi and Ohayon's brother, Itzhik Ohayon, was a "miracle child" says Ohayon. "My brother had been married previously, and could not have children. After meeting Ruthie, Afik came along. He was their whole life.

"He was a sweet boy. He was bright and smart, and was always smiling and laughing. He was one of the favourites in his kindergarten class."

When the rocket exploded, says Ohayon, Afik told his mother he loved her. "It was as if he knew what was happening. We wonder what went through his mind."

Zahavi is still in a coma, says Ohayon, and knows nothing about what occurred.

"She has had several surgeries, and she is still fighting for her life. We don't know how she'll react when she hears about it. A team of [professionals] is standing by to break the news to her," says Ohayon.

"The whole thing is unbelievable. I saw something about it on television and I felt like it was a story."

When her brother heard a child had been killed in a nearby explosion, she says he went straight to the hospital without knowing it was his son.

"Except for his face, Afik was completely burned. I can't imagine what went through my brother's mind when he saw him. That last picture will remain with him for the rest of his life."

After getting up from shivah for his son, says Ohayon, her brother planned on spending all his time at the hospital praying that Ruthie will make it.

"My hope is that she will wake up to hear the news, and will somehow learn to live with it," Ohayon says.

Afik's grandmother, 74, who lost a son to cancer about three years ago, is not taking the news well at all, she says. "She does not know how much more she can take."

Most of her family is in Israel, and they are all afraid, "but where are they going to go? They adjust to the situation and they hope nothing will happen.

"I plan on visiting in August and I am feeling quite optimistic. If something is going to happen to me, it will happen no matter where I am."

It is not an easy life for anyone in Israel, says Ohayon, "but it is their land and they are staying. The bottom line is that it is our country for good or for bad."

And now, govern

Last month's federal election was one of the most rancorous in recent memory. But it was not only the candidates and party leaders whose characters were tested and whose emotions were strained. The countless legions of partisan supporters, too, were run through the ringer of bitter resentments and simmering animosities.

But the campaign is over. The results are in. Rhetoric and anger must be set aside. It is now time for all of us – elected, defeated and members of the public – to respond to a higher loyalty than that of party and of ideology. We must now give our full devotion to the well-being of the country.

The parties must try to achieve a legislative agenda in the House of Commons that more accurately respects the will of the electorate. We do not expect parties to abandon the fundamental principles of their respective political doctrines. But we do expect them to walk a considerable distance to try to find a reasonable compromise before fundamental principles and beliefs are jeopardized. In a situation of minority government, it is ever more vital that they do so, though ironically, it is ever more difficult as well.

That is, however, Prime Minister Paul Martin's mandate. Out of the disparate patches of voter and party allegiances, as reflected in the House, he must fashion a quilt of good government. Canadians look to him to lead the way. He will determine the substance and set the tone, though the leaders of the opposition parties share this responsibility with him.

In the spirit of constructive concern and in furtherance of our sense of civic duty, we offer the following suggestions to the prime minister in the discharge of his duties. Among the many pressing social, economic, foreign and other policy initiatives his government must consider, three are essential.

• The state of the health care system. Canadians have indicated that this is our pre-eminent concern. The prime minister must respond accordingly. His first step might be to consult with Roy Romanow, who recently investigated and authored a special report on our health care system.

• Democracy. The government must nurture and affirm Canadian democratic values abroad, even as it strives to improve democratic structures at home.

• Example. Cynicism about the political process among the younger generation is at a dangerously high level. Many have disengaged from the process and that bodes ill for the future. The surest way of abating the cynicism is for politicians to set a better personal example of comportment in the execution of their responsibilities. A good beginning point would be for the prime minister to wash away – in full public view – the unseemly grime of the ad scandal by letting the trail of accountability run its important course.

It is true that elections are hard-fought contests, but they are also occasions for renewal that are part of democracy's sustaining energy.

May God grant all of our newly elected members of Parliament, and especially their leaders, the wisdom and the courage to seize that energy and jointly channel it for the betterment of the lives of all Canadians.

God's hand at work with Herzl

I was delighted to read Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits' edifying and dramatic account of the life of Theodor Herzl ("Remembering Theodor Herzl on his 100th yahrzeit," CJN, July 1). Approximately 10 years ago, Rabbi Jakobovits spoke about Herzl at a Shalosh Seudot meal at Beth Jacob synagogue. He referred to Herzl's remarks made at the first Zionist Congress in 1897: "Here at Basel, I founded the Jewish state, and the world will recognize this within 50 years."

Rabbi Jacobovits writes, "History proved him right..." The United Nations declared Israel to be a state exactly 50 years later, in 1947.

After his brief address at Beth Jacob, I approached Rabbi Jacobovits, and suggested that Herzl's words were remarkably prophetic – even in the strictest biblical sense.

As Rabbi Jacobovits so ably recounts, both Herzl's story and the man himself were extraordinary. An assimilationist Jew, his Jewish identity and journey began in his early 30s. In his mid-30s this man of royal bearing already had heart problems and he died at age 44. Without Herzl, there would be no Jewish state today – something our post-Holocaust age cannot imagine.

History proved Herzl to be right, but even more, so did God. Surely no religious Jew, from the most liberal to the extreme right (yes, Satmar itself), can fail to recognize God's hand at work in the life of Theodor Herzl. Our brethren of the right should know that, if not for Herzl, the great yeshivot of Israel and many of their religious communities would not exist. And liberal Jews should pause to reflect on the biblical-like episode of Herzl's life, and whether his remarks above were merely a coincidence.

Should not tolerate the UN

In his letter to the editor ("Ad was fact, interview was fiction," CJN, July1), Bert Raphael expresses displeasure at the fact that "there were a staggering 113 UN resolutions condemning Israel" and Canada voted or abstained on all of them.

Perhaps Raphael can tell me what country has a different or better record in this matter. Canada, like all the other countries in the United Nations, is continually guilty of sacrificing principle on the altar of expediency.

Raphael's criticism should be directed, not at Canadian policy, but at those who are tolerant of the UN and believe this corrupt, useless and ineffectual organization should continue to prosper, despite its glaring flaws, pretending all the while that it stands for something other than graft, patronage and chicanery. The UN votes to condemn Israel. So, who cares? Indeed, in a way, given the composition of the body, criticism from that quarter can be viewed as a badge of honour.

Democracy at work

It doesn't matter what side of the Israeli-Arab conflict you are on. It doesn't matter whether, in your mind, the West Bank wall is needed for security or is a reminder of past ghettos. If you are a democrat at heart, you should stand up and applaud the recent ruling by Israel's Supreme Court to move the wall. Israel's Supreme Court has the right to determine whether matters of security or of politics infringe on fundamental human rights. When the U.S. Supreme Court rules that permanent detention without charge is not legal in Guantanamo, that's a victory for the democratic process. Regardless of the outcome, the very right of the U.S. Supreme Court to deliberate on such a matter is the victory. It is during the toughest, most charged issues that we should value our checks and balances the most – even if we're on the "losing" side. In the United States, we often remember to celebrate that victory.

Frequently, though, during the perpetual propaganda wars and finger-pointing and historical claims, we Westerners forget this point about our distant cousins in Israel. As the Supreme Court ruling has demonstrated yet again, Israel's democracy is ever-present, and Israel's democracy works, despite more than 50 years of violence and conflict. I can think of no other democracy worldwide that can make that claim.

This is why the democratic world should support Israel as a shining light. Stand up and applaud the Jewish state, regardless of where you stand on these challenging issues.

The story of Mary Robinson being awarded an honorary degree has been blown out of proportion across Canada. The McGill senate, which represents over 20,000 students and 7,000 staff members, made a balanced decision and voted democratically to award the degree. Furthermore, Robinson was invited more than six months ago to a widely advertised meeting at McGill, where listeners were impressed by her directness in presenting the modern world's neglect of the poor by affluent nations. This was probably the first instance of somebody, after being selected for the nomination, discussing such controversial topics openly with an audience.

Awarding the degree to Robinson was a way of publicly recognizing her intelligence and humanity. I often talk about a greedy world promoting violence, and I defend the senate's decision and denounce Gil Troy's carping, because Robinson shares my views on this divided world of rich and poor. Money and greed are driving ever-deeper divisions between people, and I applaud any attempt to honour those who draw attention to these rifts and defend human rights. I think it is more constructive to reward the good that a person has done than to dwell on any imperfections.

Chaim Nachman Bialik: A Tribute

By MENACHEM D. ROTSTEIN

Chaim Nachman Bialik wore the crown of national poet of Israel reluctantly but with great dignity. On the 21st of Tammuz (July 10), we commemorate the 70th anniversary of his death.

An appreciation of the Bialik phenomenon requires a closer examination of the era in which he lived – not only a period in Jewish history filled with dramatic events, but one that was marked by several social, religious and political currents.

The biographical particulars of Bialik's life are significant, not just as a key to a better understanding of his poetry, but also as a paradigm for a generation whose imprint upon the history of the late 19th and early 20th centuries was critical.

Born in 1873, Bialik, like many of his eastern European contemporaries, lived in abject poverty in Czarist Russia and was tutored in early childhood by a stern and bitter grandfather in the strict Orthodoxy that had little tolerance for inquisitive minds.

The child, who was orphaned at a young age, would seek solace in nature to get away from the ordeal of the cheder and its melamdim. The vast Ukrainian wheat fields and deep forests provided shelter and respite for the boy, whose sensitive spirit and active imagination drew sustenance from the sunshine and silence of their natural wonders.

The poet's childhood and intimations of his own literary promise are beautifully captured in such poems as Zohar (Splendor), Immy Zikhrona Livrakha (My Mother, of Blessed Memory), Shirati (My Poetry), and Im Yesh Et Nafshekha Lada'at (Should You Wish to Know), as well as in the short story Meahorey haGader (Behind the Fence).

When he came of age, the teenaged Bialik was sent off to study at the Yeshiva of Volozhin. His admission to the prestigious school was an indication of his early promise and the esteem with which his elders must have regarded him. In the age-old tradition of European yeshivot, the students, some as young as 10, led a monastic, Spartan existence, living in crowded, often unheated dormitories, getting up at the crack of dawn, eating meagre meals – consumed at the table of a different family each day – and studying for endless hours well into the night.

In his epic poem Hamatmid (The Scholar), Bialik pays tribute to the generations of dedicated young men who literally laid down their lives in pursuit of learning. While he no doubt found such selfless dedication to Torah very admirable and praiseworthy, Bialik knew intuitively that he would not be able to sacrifice his own physical health and social well-being to such a cause.

Like many of his generation, Bialik found the siren call of the Enlightenment irresistible. Hebrew literature, which had begun to flourish almost a century earlier in Prussia and Galicia to the west, had already produced an impressive body of work, both in prose and poetry: dramas, essays, romantic novellas and epic poetry. By the time Bialik tried his own hand at writing, many works of the French, German, British and, of course, Russian canon had been translated into Hebrew or Yiddish. To someone as talented, hungry and ambitious as he, these were exciting times to be Jewish.

Ironically, it was within the yeshiva itself that Bialik was to be introduced to the infectious ideas of Zionism through the pamphlets of Leo Pinsker, Moshe Hess and, most significantly, Asher Ginzburg, also known as Achad Ha'am. The yeshivot were hotbeds of revolutionary agitation: many clandestine societies would be hatched within the seminary's walls, and heated debates would result in some being expelled for heresy and for challenging traditional authority.

After a number of warnings were issued and ignored, Bialik's days in Volozhin were numbered. He soon found himself back home, where he no longer belonged. But before departing for Odessa, where he would assume a significant position in the world of Hebrew letters, Bialik composed one of his best known poems, Levadi (Alone), in which he bids a tearful farewell to the old world, commiserating with the abandoned Shechina, who is left forlorn after the young have left her and gone off to seek their fortunes elsewhere.

Odessa in the 1890s was a hub of Hebrew and Yiddish cultural life. Newspapers and journals in both languages, as well as in Russian, flourished. Zionist organizations, such as Hovevey-Zion, had their head offices there. Shalom Aleichem, Achad Ha'am, Mendele Mocher Sforim, Zev Jabotinsky, Y.D. Bercovitch, and a host of others were drawn to the city to test their skills and sell their talents.

> 'Like many of his generation, Bialik found the siren call of the Enlightenment irresistible'

Bialik was recognized as a prodigy by Achad Ha'am, who signed an exclusive contract with him and published his works in the prestigious monthly Hashiloach.

It is not surprising that Bialik's poetry reflected his patron's politics and ideology. He served as delegate to a number of Zionist congresses where his views were sought and expressed. But the event that may have made Chaim Nachman Bialik a household name and given his poetry a reach well beyond the literary circles of the Hebrew intelligentsia was the pogrom in the spring of 1903 in Kishinev, a major city in Bessarabia.

The wide-scale killing and looting of Jewish neighbourhoods, which took place for several days with the tacit approval of local public security authorities, outraged the Jewish world. Bialik was picked to join a fact-finding committee dispatched to the scene to assess the damage and consider how to provide relief to the devastated community. While there, he learned how ill-prepared the local leadership was to face such an onslaught and how vulnerable and helpless was its citizenry.

The poems B'ir Haharegga (In the City of Massacre) and Al Hashechitah (On the Slaughter) were a poetic response to a condition Bialik found intolerable. As much as he accused the perpetrators of the riots for their vicious hatred and inhumanity, he cast blame upon the community for not resisting physically and for exposing itself to the violence that was so predictable. The subtext of the poems contained a challenge to religious authorities to begin facing reality and step out of the insular environment that was detrimental to their very survival.

The outrage voiced in these poems was almost biblical in tone. Readers, especially the young, responded viscerally to the call to defend Jewish dignity and property everywhere. They found in Bialik a bold and coherent spokesman for their Zionist aspirations. His poems have been credited with promoting the emergence of clandestine self-defence associations in a number of cities and towns in Czarist Russia and in the growth of membership in the ranks of Zionist youth movements.

It is therefore understandable how, within a relatively short period between 1900 and 1910, Bialik became the arbiter of the cultural agenda for the Zionist movement.

Assuming the prestigious position of literary editor of Hashiloach allowed him to nurture and promote an entire generation of up-and-coming writers, most of whom were the beneficiaries of a better secular education than his, but who stood in complete awe of his prodigious talent. Bialik was peripatetic, moving back and forth between Odessa, Warsaw and Berlin, launching new publishing enterprises, giving readings and holding court at his hotel for the multitude of admirers who sought his advice and his blessings.

A short, heavy-set, bald figure, Bialik, by today's standards, was far from the image of a media celebrity. And yet, at the height of his career, Bialik required a phalanx of bodyguards to surround him and prevent the crowds from crushing him when he made his frequent public appearances in Europe and North America. He obliged a number of painters and sculptors by posing for his portrait, and most schools in Israel displayed his photo, usually next to that of Theodore Herzl.

One can hardly imagine today a literary figure – other than J.R. Rowling perhaps – who can inspire public adulation to the same degree than Bialik did during the late 1920s and early 1930s.

In 1924, as Russia was about to become a vast prison under the dictatorship of Joseph Stalin, Bialik and his wife Mania, along with a handful of Jewish intellectuals, managed to secure safe passage from Odessa to Palestine. There, in the newly established city of Tel Aviv, the Bialiks were given a royal welcome. In a quiet street named in his honour, Mayor Meir Dizengoff built an oriental villa surrounded by a magnificent garden, to inspire and pamper the poetic soul.

Bialik was to live there for the last decade of his life, assuming the role of editor and publisher. He envisioned Dvir publications as a national enterprise that would eventually collate and publish the works of past generations in poetry and prose. He and his partner, Y.H. Ravnitzky, completed work on the seminal Sefer Ha'aggadah, the non-legal literature of the Mishnah and the Talmud.

Beit-Bialik, as his home became known, was a centre of cultural life in Little Tel Aviv, and in some respects its owner was revered as a secular "rebbe." Bialik's contributions to the revival of the Hebrew language were numerous, most importantly, by writing children's ditties and songs for the nursery – a generation was raised on his poetry without realizing it. He died childless in Vienna in the summer of 1934 while recuperating from an operation, and was buried in a state funeral in the old cemetery of Tel Aviv, a few blocks from his home. The house serves now as a museum and learning centre.

The point of it all

"It's all pointless; who cares what I do?"

It was the first crisis of my young rabbinic career. I was 22 years old and a summer intern at a California shul. I was on the phone with J.K., a young man who had attended my classes, when he started to tell me his life was awful, his finances disastrous and his family dysfunctional. He was planning to swallow a bottle of aspirin, and he was confiding in me, an inexperienced rabbi to-be, about his grisly plan. (A call to the psychiatric hotline ultimately prevented J.K.'s suicide).

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

To this day, his words haunt me. With all my rabbinic training, I wasn't able to answer a basic question: Why not commit suicide?

So let me try again.

A long philosophical tradition endorses suicide for the distressed. The Stoic philosopher Epictetus writes: "Above all, remember that the door stands open. Do not be more fearful than children. Just as when they are tired of the game they cry, 'I will play no more,' so too when you are in a similar situation, cry, 'I will play no more' and depart". Voltaire, Hume and Schopenhauer all supported suicide. Today, Dr. Jack Kevorkian and others advocate the "right to die."

Philosophy aside, I have the feeling that a cavalier attitude toward suicide is often based on the nihilistic belief that "it's all pointless." If there's no point to it all, there's no reason to bother with a difficult life.

In Judaism, there is no right to die. Life is a sacred gift, and we must survive, even in hellish conditions. Rabbi Ephraim Oshry, the rabbi of the Kovno ghetto, was asked if someone may commit suicide rather than watch his family be murdered. His response, while filled with compassion, was, "Absolutely not." Indeed, Rabbi Oshry took pride in the fact there were few suicides in the Kovno ghetto, despite enormous suffering.

Life in the ghetto was pure torture, so why was he so resolute about suicide? Because he realized the value of life. The economics of suicide says life is less valuable than suffering, but that's simply not true. If there's one lesson in Jewish history, it's that a life filled with ideals is worthwhile, even at the cost of suffering. That's why there are Jews today, despite generations of persecution.

So, this is my belated response to J.K.

Rabbi Oshry and his compatriots suffered more than anyone else in history. Yet, they persevered, because they knew the future of humanity depends on people who follow their ideals, no matter the cost.

J.K., that's the point of it all: idealism. Because life in service of ideals is worthwhile, despite the suffering.

The urgent situation in Sudan

Sudan has become a symbol to good people around the world who are fed up with the United Nations. That Sudan has a seat on the UN Human Rights Commission strains incredulity, and one's vocabulary, especially after the United States was recently voted off the commission.

Gil Troy in Montreal

More than hypocritical or farcical, it is evil to entrust the lofty ideal of universal rights to such a bestial dictatorship as Sudan. And it is equally unconscionable that the commission, like the UN's General Assembly, has chided democratic Israel so many more times than genocidal Sudan.

The Sudan tragedy results from modern Islamicist evil, Arab expansionism, Muslim complicity and Christian passivity. Jews can better understand why so few non-Jews help us if we contemplate the overwhelming Christian silence while their co-religionists were uprooted, enslaved, raped, branded and slaughtered for 20 years. That much of the murder is ideologically motivated, and related to the broader clash of civilizations misleadingly labelled as the "war on terror," makes it all the more unnerving – and the silence even more unacceptable.

There are two major Sudanese tragedies. The latest crisis in the northwest takes place against a blood-splattered backdrop of two decades of civil war in the south. The Sudanese civil war is winding down, after two million died and countless others were maimed and enslaved – yes, slavery still exists today in the Arab world. The victims were mostly Christians or animists who were targeted by Sudan's Islamic government. The heart-rending silence during that conflict is a matter of historical record, a blot on all of us who were passive.

Now, in the northwestern Darfur region, Arab Janjawid militias are targeting black African tribal farmers in a push for Arab supremacy. The conflict is racial and ethnic, not religious, as the killers and the victims are Muslims. Thus far, the Janjawids have murdered 30,000 and displaced 1.2 million – note how casually we throw around these mind-numbing figures.

The brutality is systematic. Men are murdered as their wives are raped, then branded, to make the emotional trauma physical and permanent. The murderers sometimes throw corpses into the local water sources to poison the water supply.

An ugly ideology and vicious strategies link the two conflicts. A column in the London Times reported that eyewitnesses from Darfur "consistently describe genocidal tactics honed during the war in southern Sudan. Before and after, the Janjawid destroy, plunder, rape, kill and burn their way through a village, the civilians are hit by [the] Sudanese air force to ensure nothing and nobody is left standing. This gargantuan crime requires a high level of co-ordination."

Torrential rains are about to begin, rendering these displaced villagers even more vulnerable to disease and starvation. Then, the Arab Muslim militias will be facilitating genocide by famine – letting nature do their dirty work.

New York Times columnist Nicholas Kristof, who has written searing pieces from the Sudan, notes that Jewish and Christian charities have helped, but "one of the big gaps has been Islamic charities, which have tended – inexcusably – to show sympathy for Sudan's Arab government. So the sad and ironic outcome is that the people of Darfur, who are virtually all Muslims, are getting significant help from Christians and Jews but almost nothing from fellow Muslims."

Sudan must be more than a punchline in the tragicomedy the United Nations has become. The Sudan must be more than a truncheon swung against an expansionist, delusional, lethal Islamicist ideology and push for Arab supremacy. We ignore it at our peril.

Our professoriate would denounce it more consistently and passionately, were such a xenophobic, toxic and illiberal ideology embraced by westerners, let alone Jews, rather than Third World countries. The tragedy is too vast, the needs too great, for us to rest on our debating points and our self-satisfaction.

We must do something – as Jews burdened by the world's silence during the Holocaust; as Zionists proud of Israel's role in trying to help ease African pain; as human beings embarrassed by our silence during the Rwanda massacres, the Congo famine and the first Sudanese civil war; and as liberal democrats committed to justice.

The challenge is pressing. The opportunity is ours. How dare we sit, drinking our morning coffee, tut-tutting over evil without trying to fight it?

Forgetting to remember, remembering to forget

Come summer, come travel. Suddenly airport security scanners become more familiar to me than my own front door. During the weeks immediately preceding the federal election, my knees spent more hours wedged tightly against the seat in front of me than my feet did on terra firma.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Out of the country just as Canadian politics was heating up (in a Canadian way), I pored over Canadian newspapers wherever I could find them – in airports, on airplanes, on the web – and huddled with other Canadians in transit to exchange intelligence.

One particular newspaper article that ran just prior to the election stuck with me well after the votes had been tallied. The article featured an interview with a man now in his 70s, one of several closeups of "average citizens." This interview lingers in my mind, because it has resonances well beyond the election.

The man interviewed stated that under no circumstances would he ever vote Liberal – not in this election, nor in any election, come what may. In fact, he had not voted Liberal, he asserted, since World War II. He explained that he had been drafted to fight in that war, and he has never forgiven the Liberals – for the war, the draft, the upheaval to his life. He did not claim to be a pacifist, he was simply dismayed that his life was, as he saw it, inconvenienced by politicians.

I was struck by the interview because one does not often come upon a Canadian or American who lived through that era and who speaks about that war in those terms. Other wars, later wars, are viewed with more contention. For Americans, the war in Vietnam was a watershed, shifting the opinion of large numbers of people about what military force can accomplish and bringing a heightened awareness of the ills of war, the moral ambiguities entailed in declaring war and the mixed motivations of powerful nations.

But World War II is largely regarded as the good war – not in a machismo sense that fighting is good in and of itself, but in the sense of a war fought for a good cause. While researchers have deepened our understanding of the dynamics of World War II and of the complicated and ambivalent motivation of many North American politicians in engaging in it or resisting engagement, the Second World War is still seen as a just war – horrifying in many ways, but necessary.

Even now, that war is invoked as a paradigm to argue in favour of a proposed military action, just as the United States' involvement in Viet Nam is invoked as a paradigm for misguided, ruinous or corrupt military intervention.

Most Jews see World War II in stark terms: the war necessary to stop Nazi Germany from carrying out its planned murder of Europe's Jewry. But the Canadian man who – even decades later – could never make his peace with the Liberal party for launching him into battle remembers only the very personal impact of war on his own life. One imagines that, in his eyes, a battle fought on some other continent was (and remains) someone else's business. Inherent in his memory is a kind of forgetting – of a history replete with the suffering of others, who, but for the intervention of the Allied forces on the battlefield, would have perished in horrible ways.

It was with this fellow countryman in mind that I recently visited the newly erected monument to World War II veterans in Washington, D.C. Ironically, this memorial – though august and expensive – also fails to remember the very war it was designed to commemorate.

Replete with fountains and reflecting pools, positioned between the monuments of two great statesmen of democracy, the memorial does little to help one remember. Pillars represent each state and territorial possession that contributed soldiers, and walls bear basreliefs depicting fighting men and generic, clichéd quotations about war, sacrifice and victory. But one walks away with no impression of the Second World War – neither the nature of the battle, nor the nature of the enemy.

As we emerge from the elections – our collective engagement in shaping our future – it may be time to remind ourselves to remember the past. For it is through that lens that we see and understand the present moment.

Holocaust marked the children of survivors

The aging baby boomers in the crowded reception room, which was abuzz with the drone of multiple conversations, were mainly in their mid-40s to late 50s.

The majority of the men had thinning hair flecked with strands of gray. Some had already turned snow white, while others were pretty much bald. Not a few sported paunches.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Most of the women were somewhat matronly, though several exuded a faint aura of glamour.

Come to think of it, they looked a little like my parents must have when I was a boy in Montreal.

Cold drinks in hand, they talked about everyday subjects and seemed perfectly normal and at ease in their skins.

These middle-aged Torontonians were almost uniformly the children of Holocaust survivors. They gathered at the Park Hyatt Hotel last month at the invitation of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, which had launched its Holocaust Education Legacy Fund. The fund plans to send Canadian teachers to participate in Holocaust educational programs and seminars at Yad Vashem, the memorial centre and museum in Jerusalem.

The sons and daughters of Holocaust survivors, myself included, form a unique generation. We know this in our heart of hearts and in the marrow of our bones.

The Final Solution, conceived and implemented by the Nazis and their collaborators throughout Europe, was an unprecedented event until the genocide in Rwanda a decade ago. The Jews, like the Tutsis in Africa, were expressly singled out for mass extermination, and the world was mainly indifferent.

As I mingled with my contemporaries, three overlapping questions passed through my mind.

How had they been marked by their parents' horrifying ordeal?

What had their mothers and fathers endured before Hitler's Third Reich finally crumbled into dust, and how had they been touched by the Holocaust?

I explored these topics with three offsprings of survivors: Renate Krakauer, a 63-year-old retired administrator and maybe the only person in the room born and hidden during the Holocaust; Dr. Joel Dimitry, a 58-year-old dentist and board member of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, and Erika Kirschner, a 56-year-old interior decorator.

Krakauer's parents, William and Charlotte Tannenzapf, were born in Stanislawow, then in Poland but now in Ukraine. He was an electrical engineer and she was a pharmacist.

Still alive and spry, they are now in their 90s. "I guess they must have good genes. They are very strong, both physically and emotionally."

A pharmacist who went on to become an acting assistant deputy minister in the Ontario Ministry of Health, Krakauer was born in March 1941, five months before the Soviet army retreated from Stanislawow in the face of a German offensive.

The first German aktion, known as Bloody Sunday, took place on Oct. 12, when Jews were ordered to pack their valuables and assemble in front of city hall.

"They were chased with whips and bayonets into the cemetery, where they were pushed into pits and shot," said Krakauer.

By nightfall, approximately 10,000 Jews had been killed by rotating firing squads. "Luckily, my parents, waiting for the banging on the door, were somehow passed by in this aktion." In the wake of this unspeakable slaughter of innocents, the surviving Jews were herded into a ghetto, which was separated from the rest of the population by a high fence. The ghetto was subjected to frequent aktions, but Krakauer's parents survived as workers in a recycling factory.

Renate Krakauer

In the autumn of 1942, her mother escaped from the ghetto, Krakauer in her arms, and found refuge in a nearby village with a Polish widow.

A few months later, following Germany's defeat at the Battle of Stalingrad, her father, posing as a peasant and commandeering a horse and wagon, also escaped and was reunited with his family.

"We spent the next year-and-a half in the attic, in the cow shed, in a hole in the ground covered with straw, and in the woods."

Liberated in the summer of 1944, they returned to Stanislawow malnourished and in rags, only to discover that its Jewish population had been murdered and that its Polish inhabitants were none too pleased to see them back. They left Poland and arrived in Montreal at the end of 1948.

Although Krakauer has no personal recollections about the Holocaust, she was made acutely aware of the period whenever her parents talked about it.

"Perhaps living with the stories of the Holocaust gave me the perspective that no disaster in my life can compare to what my parents went through."

As a youngster, Krakauer tried to suppress her Holocaust connection. "I wanted to blend in and be like everyone else. But as an adult, I learned it is an important legacy and an integral part of who I am. I feel a strong responsibility not to allow it to be forgotten."

Her relationship with her parents is unusually close. "My feelings of protectiveness for them may be greater than those of most other adult children whose parents are not Holocaust survivors."

She recalls that, in their home, food could be a contentious subject. "I was seriously berated as a child when I didn't finish everything on my plate. How could I not appreciate all this good food after they had been reduced to eating potato peelings?"

She believes her parents' financial success in Canada stemmed, in part, from their harrowing experiences. "They had to be very resourceful and self-reliant. I was always told, 'You can't depend on anyone but yourself and your family.'"

Indeed, family has been very important to Krakauer, who missed having grandparents and relatives. "When I first met my aunt – my father's only surviving sister who went to Israel – I couldn't believe she was really my very own relative."

Krakauer, who attended Labour Zionist summer camps in the Laurentians as a teenager, feels exceedingly close to Israel. "I sent my kids to Camp Shalom. My youngest daughter lived in Israel for three years and served in the army for 18 months. My children have definitely been touched by their grandparents' experiences. They are familiar with the history and have heard many stories from their grandparents over the years."

Dimitry's parents, Norma and Nathan, hail from Lithuania. Interned in the Vilna ghetto, Norma managed to escape through the sewers as it was being liquidated. Nathan was a partisan after his family was wiped out. He and his wife immigrated to Canada in 1948, two years after Dimitry's birth.

"Their whole lives were affected by the Holocaust. They were reserved, but spoke to me about their experiences, good and bad. I heard about them from the moment I learned to speak."

His friends think he is too intense. "But I find most children of survivors are more focused and determined. My generation is lucky to be alive. Had the war gone a few more years, I probably would not be here. We feel our lives are privileged, and I thank my parents for their strength and courage."

Dimitry, who has immersed himself in the literature of the Holocaust and has spoken about it at memorial events, has deep respect for his parents. "I am awed by my father's heroism as a partisan. He claims he had nothing to lose, yet he still had a desperate will to live. My mother was 19 when she went into the sewer system under Vilna."

"They saved and planned for the future," he added, referring to their lives in Canada. "My father took chances in business and real estate and was successful. He was not afraid of anything or anyone. He used to say, 'No one could be as bad as the Nazis.' My mother took advantage of schooling in Toronto, and still today is an active reader."

A member of Canadian Jewish Congress' Holocaust committee, Dimitry has a special bond with Israel. "A Jewish state, in 1933 would have stopped the Holocaust. Israel must be preserved at all costs as a free country for Jews."

Kirschner's parents, Eva and Laszlo, are from Budapest and Bratislava, respectively. She obtained false identity papers as a Christian and thus was able to save her family from the gas chambers. He was a forced labourer who almost died of malnutrition.

"They were very much affected by the Holocaust," she said. Her mother turned into "a very hard person," while her father suffered from a debilitating malady.

"I am very much part of a unique generation, a tragic generation," said Kirschner, a divorcée and ex-Montrealer who has been battling cancer for the past four years.

Asked if she feels emotionally burdened as a child of Holocaust survivors, she replied, "On the one hand, it is a great burden. But on the other hand, I consider myself lucky that I made it into the world at such a difficult time."

A question of family

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

Within the Torah portions of the next few weeks is the passage in which two of the tribes of Israel ask to remain outside the borders of the land. The tribes of Reuben and Gad negotiate a deal with Moses wherein they can remain across the Jordan to establish themselves in fertile ground.

The first time they make the request, Moses responds with a pointed question: "Your brothers are to go to battle and you are to remain here?"

Moses is pointing out the issues of family that were ignored in the tribal request. The two tribes were concerned about their future livelihood. They mentioned the fertile pastures they could see, but they did not mention their own children or their extended family, the other tribes.

The second time they turn to Moses with their request, it seems they have better understood that family must enter the picture. In the second attempt, they mention that they intend to build structures for their sheep and cities for their children. Although their mention of children is welcomed, it seems that as yet they do not understand that the primary blessing of covenant is children. Surely the cities built for their children should take precedence over the structures for the sheep.

Interestingly, the tribes commit themselves to accompanying the rest of Israel and helping to settle the land. They propose to leave their children in the territory across the Jordan while the able men accompany the army of Israel. In other words, they are beginning to express the responsibility brethren shoulder for each other: the commitment to extended family.

Moses responds by agreeing to their proposal, and he restates it. He begins by emphasizing that they are to accompany the other tribes into Israel and assist in establishing safety for all. He continues by talking of the cities they will build for their children and then the structures for the sheep. Moses reverses the order of the priorities by showing that children come before livelihood.

Finally, the two tribes affirm what Moses has said. They now state clearly that they will build cities for their children and their women. Mention of their flocks comes only at the end.

The progression of the negotiation speaks directly to the issues of covenant. Before Moses can agree to have two of the tribes live away from the other tribes, outside the border of Israel, Moses needs to hear that they have understood the importance of covenant. In their first request, it was clear that they did not yet comprehend that children must be their first concern.

Moses directs them to understand that first we learn to love within our homes. The people within our homes then become our extended family, but our love and responsibility for them continues. Once that is strong, we can love within the new families we build. Covenant directs us forward, and therefore we must focus on our children. Only once the tribes are able to articulate this is Moses willing to accept their suggestion.

In fact, these two tribes later create a crisis within the nation of Israel when they build an altar on foreign land, something forbidden at the time. When confronted by the other tribes, the two explain that the altar they built is non-functioning. They constructed it as a symbol that would connect their children and their culture with the Israelite children of the other tribes living within the land of Israel. They were creating common symbols, common language and common values so that geography would never be a divide between their children and the children of the other tribes.

Moses taught them well that the practice that begins in our homes will quickly extend beyond. The midrash would later teach us the same lesson: "If a man sins against those of his own household, he will inevitably come to sin against his neighbour."

Drildzer celebrates 70th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Some 120 people recently celebrated the Drildzer Congregation and Society's 70th anniversary, including a number who were among the group's early founders.

The second, third and fourth generations were also represented at the banquet, held at the Pride of Israel Synagogue, with Rochelle Sufrin, daughter of Jack Stopper, as the evening's chair.

After meeting informally for three decades, the Drildzer was formed in 1934 by eight founders, whose children and grandchildren have remained active in the society. The congregation began in a shul on Huron Street, then moved twice more before settling into its current location on Wilson Avenue.

Honoured at the banquet were second-generation Drildzer members Jack Bliman, Sam Bongard, Hy Goldstein, Max Hain, Jack Silverman, Jack Stopper and Sol Zigler.

On display were banners, photos, original ledgers and other memorabilia, some dating back to 1934.

Drildzer president Mae Waese reported that an archival video of the society's senior members, who are now in their late 80s and 90s, is being completed by the video committee co-chaired by Sam Hoffer and Harvey Golombek. Rough cuts of the video were presented at the banquet.

"In the video, the members tell the story of what brought them to Toronto from Drildz, how they started the society and why it became a significant part of their lives," Waese said. "The video is a treasure.

Waese, daughter of the late Joe Rutman, one of the early founding members, announced that to commemorate the 70th anniversary, the members have formed the Ilza Historical Cemetery Restoration Project to restore the Jewish cemetery in Drildz, in south-central Poland, 75 miles south of Warsaw.

The Jewish cemetery of Drildz, established in 1837, was almost totally destroyed during World War II. In 1942, the Germans forced the Jews to transport the matzevot (stones) to swampy areas for road building near Radom. The few shards remaining are now part of a forest on the outskirts of the town.

Brenda and Barney Dales, who have visited Drildz, are the co-chairs of the restoration project, for which the committee has established the groundwork in North America and Poland.

"This will allow us to turn our cemetery into a place that will honour the memory of our ancestors buried there and those Jews who were buried in at least one mass grave during the Shoah," says Brenda Dales.

"The cemetery restoration will be under the supervision of the chief rabbi of Warsaw and Lodz and donations to the restoration are tax deductible in Canada and in the United States."

For information on the restoration, visit www.ilzacemetery.org or contact the Dales at 416-482-2233.

Claims Conference gets $174 million more for slave labourers

NEW YORK — A new agreement will bring $174 million (US) more to Holocaust-era slave labourers, the Claims Conference announced last week.

The new money represents slightly more than half the interest earned from the original slave and forced labourer settlement reached in 2000 with German government and industry. It will go to meet a funding shortfall in payments to former Holocaust-era slave and forced labourers created when more slave labourers were documented than originally estimated.

The announcement came after a year of talks in Berlin among the Claims Conference; the German foundation in charge of the settlement, Remembrance, Responsibility, and the Future; groups representing non-Jewish slave and forced labourers in Poland, the Czech Republic, Russia, Ukraine and Belarus; and the International Organization for Migration (IOM).

The Claims Conference documented more slave labour cases than had been originally estimated, which led to a shortfall in funds needed to pay former slave labourers the maximum amount allowed under the German law governing the foundation. The latest agreement will enable the Claims Conference to make the maximum payments to former slave labourers. More than 141,000 Jewish former labourers have been approved for payment.

The German foundation will turn over the rest of the interest, about $169 million, to seven other groups, including the IOM and those representing non-Jewish slave and forced labourers.

"We have been pressing this issue for a long time. This major success paves the way for us to complete processing so that the final payment under this program can be made to more than 140,000 Holocaust survivors around the world," said Claims Conference executive vice-president Gideon Taylor, .

The new funding will affect the following groups as follows:

• The German foundation will soon release funds to the Claims Conference that will enable it to pay the promised second instalment of 2,500 euros (originally denominated as 5,000 deutschmarks) to most living former slave labourers by the end of August. (This is in addition to the first instalment of DM 10,000.)

• This month, the Claims Conference will make payments to 710 Holocaust survivors who endured medical experiments. These payments are in addition to the ones made in January 2004 to 1,778 survivors under this program. The payments to these additional survivors will total some $3.6 million (US).

• Processing of heir claims will start after final payments to living Holocaust survivors. Heir application packages will be mailed by the end of August. The German foundation says payments to heirs should begin in December, when the amount for each heir will be determined by the amount of funds available.

The Claims Conference represents world Jewry in negotiating for compensation and restitution for victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs. It administers compensation funds, recovers unclaimed Jewish property, and allocates funds to institutions that provide social welfare services to Holocaust survivors and preserve the memory and lessons of the Shoah.

Remembering Naomi Shemer

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When Naomi Shemer died, lovers of Israeli music lost one of the most beloved and prolific songwriters the country has ever produced. Almost immediately, heartfelt appreciations and articles begin to appear on the Internet about the "First Lady of Israeli Song." Today, we remember Naomi Shemer.

Her introduction to music was at singalongs at Kibbutz Kinneret. Gid Avivi and Sagui Ben-Nun have written a wonderful biography that traces Shemer's roots from kibbutz to Jerusalem's Rubin Academy of Music to eventual stardom. Along the way, she was able to connect her songs to her childhood and give them "a charm and innocence… Shemer's music linked the ordinary to the festive, the landscapes of Lake Kinneret to the white city of Tel Aviv, her own biography to the history of Israel between war and peace." [www.haaretz.com/hasen/spages/443642.html]

Michael Palti points out in Ha'aretz that Shemer also had the ability to provoke political debate and inspire national passions. When she wrote the line "The market square is empty" in Jerusalem of Gold, Shemer was criticized, since Arabs lived there. Shemer's response was: "As long as there were no Jews there, in my eyes it was empty."

Even though Shemer may have identified herself with the Gush Emunim movement and settlers in the territories, some of her best friends were artists on the left like singer Hava Alberstein. "Each of us knew the other's position, but we were two Israeli women living here for better or for worse." [www.haaretz.com /hasén/spages/443668]

Shemer herself emphasized that although many of her songs were commissioned by the army, "it is important to note that I wrote for the army and not about the army… My songs, like Machar (Tomorrow), were written for the young people in the army; this is a song about being young and full of hope for peace. If you read carefully, you will see that I made sure my songs were full of colours like green and blue not khaki, because, personally, I do not have such fond memories of being in the army." Read the rest of Shemer's 2000 interview at the Jerusalem Post website. [http://tinyurl.com/33pl3]

Not surprisingly, there's an entire website devoted to Jerusalem of Gold. [www.jerusalemofgold.co.il/] The sites points out how close the song came to not being written. In 1967 (prior to the Six Day War,) Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek asked that songs performed in that year's Independence Day Song Festival be related to Jerusalem. Incredibly, a search of the archives of Israel Radio revealed that no songs composed after 1948 mentioned the divided city where Jews were forbidden to visit the Kotel. Five composers were commissioned to write songs for the festival, but only Shemer (after considerable coaxing) delivered a song.

And then there was the question about who would perform it. Shemer had heard a young soldier named Shuli Natan sing on the radio and decided she would be perfect. Shemer faced opposition to her choice of an amateur but stuck with Natan. The rest is history. You can hear a large excerpt of Shuli Natan's rendition online. [www.cdbaby.com/mp3lofi/shuly3-21.m3u] You can also listen to a complete instrumental version, read the lyrics [http://tinyurl.com/2tewa] as well as download sheet music for the song. [http://tinyurl.com/2qor8]

Naomi Shemer is remembered for much more than one song. She is loved for her hundreds of other songs, many of which have become Israeli folk standards. Song like Lu Yehi which started off as a Hebrew version of The Beatles' Let it Be, Lo Ahavti Di (I Have Not Loved Enough), and Al Kol Aleh (For All These Things) that become associated with the campaign against the evacuation of the Yamit settlement in the Sinai. [http:// tinyurl.com /39ct2] You can listen to excerpts of 45 of Shemer's greatest hits online. [http:// tinyurl.com/3f6n8]

The death of Naomi Shemer has touched her admirers around the world. I'll leave the last word to one of the people who left messages of condolence at the Jerusalem Post website. [http:// tinyurl.com/2ggab] "For all of us who came on Aliyah during those sad years following the Yom Kippur War, Naomi Shemer's songs helped lift our spirits – as those of the entire nation as well. Naomi was an icon to this country and to Hebrew verse put into song. May her sweet memory inspire all who love and cherish this land as she did." Maurice Picow, Netanya.

Greater Toronto Area

'Everyone pitches in to raise funds for local needs'

Jackson, who, among other things, is responsible for planning and allocating funds to federation-sponsored agencies in the Toronto area, and acts as the community's continuity resource, said the Jewish community began to organize as soon as Jews came to Canada in sufficient numbers.

"The concept of organizing the community was complicated, yet obvious. At the core was the next generation. Structures had to be put in place so the next generation would have more."

Despite all the work that is done formally, such as improving the educational system and building synagogues and community centres, "the community is not about a bunch of paid people doing work. It is about volunteers, about individuals. That ripples out to the entire community," Jackson said.

"What is special about an organized community is that everyone pitches in to raise funds for local needs. The word passion becomes an important piece of this puzzle. Each person involved does it for the love of the community."

Rosensweig, a weekly columnist for The CJN and co-host of a weekly talk show on CFRB radio, launched Ve'ahavta in 1997.

Since its inception, the organization has spearheaded medical and education missions to Guyana's rainforests, sent its "Jewish Peace Corps" to Zimbabwe to work in a Salvation Army hospital, and responded to natural disasters in Honduras, El Salvador, Argentina and Turkey.

It has also established a homeless program in Toronto in partnership with the native community, and has recently launched a program in Israel to assist youth in distress.

Rosensweig said he is impressed with the work of the local Jewish community, but added that we must ask ourselves if we are doing a good job as individuals.

"Our organizations flourish, but as individuals we have started to lock ourselves away. [As we have become more successful], we have insulated ourselves.

"We have to ask if we are playing a role in the betterment of the world around us. I don't believe we're doing a great job.

"We send kids to Poland, and every time there is a movie about the Holocaust, we fill rooms, but we are not responding to Holocaust education in the way we say we should."

In Sudan, he said, two million people have been killed since 1984, and "as we speak, ethnic cleansing is going on in western Sudan. In 1984 there was a massacre in Rwanda, only a few hours away by plane, [and] in Cambodia millions disappeared and were murdered in the '70s.

"Even though we say 'Never again,' few people are responding to what is happening in Sudan. [We do not stand up as individuals] and say 'I feel the pain.'"

Rosensweig stressed, though, that this is not a negative critique.

"I see what the Jewish people have done and I see the possibilities. If we decided that there were to be no more homeless, and we stood up and gave of ourselves, I know we could do it. I have great faith in our potential to step outside ourselves and make the world shine.

Ve'ahavta's work has helped to eradicate a lot of anti-Semitism, Rosensweig said. "[By introducing] ourselves to others, we have to become friends with the world and allow them to become friends with us.

"We must teach our [children] to open their door and be empathetic to [other people's] pain. We have to educate them to reach out and be courageous and helpful."

He praised students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) for collecting vitamins and sending them on a Ve'ahavta mission to the rainforest.

One of the problems, Rosensweig said, is that we have turned our biblical figures into near-deities, instead of looking at them as role models. "They are unreachable. We should teach Torah so [students] learn from these people. They have to emulate them and mimic them."

Asked how people can volunteer in the community, Jackson said there are many opportunities listed at www.doingjewishtoronto.com, a website operated by UJA Federation.

EDUCATORS STUDY IN ISRAEL: Toronto teachers, principals and supervisors representing congregational and community schools that receive UJA Mishpacha grants, went on a mission to Israel in June, where they engaged in text study, related excursions and discussion aimed at helping families connect more meaningfully with Israel. Members of the group are seen at the Supreme Court Building in Jerusalem. The study mission was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Jewish Agency for Israel and Partnership 2000.

Torontonian Shai Spetgang and Avraham Israel, of the Israel Export Institute, shared ideas on environmental issues at a recent Israeli conference.

Canadian forges environmental ties at conference in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shai Spetgang needed 30 seconds – give or take – to decide to accept the Israel Economic Mission's offer to send him to Tel Aviv for an environmental technology conference.

In his job as membership services and program development staffer for the Ontario Environment Industry Association (ONEIA), a non-profit business association with a membership of 140, the 28-year-old Torontonian liaises mainly with Ontario businesses that deal with environmental issues.

Sometimes, however, his work extends beyond local bounds. Once, he said, a pig farmer who'd seen the ONEIA website e-mailed him from Russia, requesting advice on turning pig waste into fertilizer.

The meeting in Israel – the 3rd International Exhibition for Environmental Studies – combined Spetgang's interest in environmental and business issues with his connection to Israel. His parents were born there and he attended Yeshivat Dvar Yerushalayim before spending a semester at the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies while he was working toward his BA in environmental studies at York University.

In mid-May, after learning about the conference, Spetgang contacted the Toronto offices of the Israel Economic Mission – an offshoot of Israel's ministry of industry and trade – and discussed the possibility of furthering co-operative efforts between Canada and Israel, using the environmentally related technologies of both countries.

Within days, he received a call offering him an opportunity to cover the event as a journalist. Coincidentally, the mission had just received a request to arrange for a journalist to attend the conference as a guest of the ministry and of the Israel Export Institute, a semi-governmental organization. Spetgang, who had already written for trade journals, was delighted to have the opportunity.

"It was bashert," he said, using the Yiddish word for "meant to be." Along with journalists from more than a dozen countries, Spetgang – to the best of his knowledge the only North American there – joined 100 Israeli exhibitors and delegations from four countries, including Rwanda and Malawi, for the three-day event last month.

The conference included tours to six environmental sites including Beit She'an National Park, where participants learned about innovative heating and structure in ancient Roman bathhouses.

Spetgang also toured the Israeli company Arrow Ecology's waste treatment plant, a pilot project in which technology is used to separate and process recyclable and non-recyclable waste.

Ormat Industries, one of Israel's largest environmental companies, has one of its 200 facilities in Canada, said Spetgang. In Israel, he toured an Ormat plant that manufactures equipment to turn "waste heat" ("leftover" heat generated by industrial processes such as making cement) to create electricity.

Environmentally, at least in some respects, Israel is where Canada was two decades ago, said Spetgang. Although Israeli technology, like Canada's, is cutting edge, and the country is advanced in the area of water conservation, many Israeli companies exceed their legal pollution limits, he noted.

Canada and Israel, he said, can learn a lot from each other.

93-year-old graduates from U of T

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

As a recent graduate of the University of Toronto's Woodsworth College, Saul Goldstein, 93, has proven that his mind is still young and full of potential.

"I feel very elevated," said Goldstein, who received a bachelor of science with distinction in psychology on June 16. "Throughout my studies, I didn't realize the importance of it all. It's wonderful what I have achieved. I'm very proud of my B.Sc., and I understand from people that it's an amazing accomplishment."

Saul Goldstein

The grandfather of seven said the convocation ceremony was both moving and exciting. "When I was called up to receive my diploma, the whole audience stood up and applauded. It was an extraordinary feeling."

Barbara Track, executive director of advancement, alumni and communications at Woodsworth College, said Goldstein is the second-oldest student to have ever graduated from U of T.

But as the eldest of the seven seniors who took part in his convocation ceremony, Goldstein was the centre of attention.

"The crowd went wild for him," Track said.

Aside from realizing he has been a role model for fellow students, Goldstein said he has successfully followed in the footsteps of his children – daughter Vivian Tankus, a French teacher; son Roger Goldstein, a respiratory specialist and professor of medicine at U of T; and daughter-in-law Rose Geist, a psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Children and associate professor of medicine at U of T.

"No wonder I take to learning. I have to keep up with them all! I'm surrounded by graduates," he said.

The German-born Goldstein fled his adopted home of Hungary in 1938 at the urging of his father, a rabbi, as the Nazi threat grew. He settled in England, and his father, brother, mother-in-law and brother-in-law were later killed in the Holocaust.

He worked in a British button factory for most of his adult life – he and his wife moved to Canada in 1983 to be close to his children and granchildren – and had never attended a post-secondary institution. That made his decision to attend U of T nerve-wracking, he said.

"I was worried in the beginning. There were younger children [in the lectures] – well, young to me at least, 17 and 18 years old. I wondered how they would treat me."

To Goldstein's surprise, he said, his teachers and classmates were more than welcoming. Some offered to help him get from his car to lecture halls with his roller walker, while others assisted him with course material. One student even gave him a stuffed ladybug on Valentine's Day.

He completed his degree with a spot on the dean's list, but Goldstein stressed the experience would not have been possible without the help of his daughter-in-law Geist.

He said that after his wife Sidonie died a number of years ago, he was "obviously desperate" and needed a distraction from his sorrow.

Geist suggested university could fill his lonely days.

"She encouraged me and was very supportive. I am very grateful to her."

Goldstein said he has always loved psychology and could find no better way to occupy his time than studying the subject for almost four years.

While his age made him a novelty in the classroom, Goldstein said it posed certain burdens when assignments rolled around.

He said his main problem was using the computer to do research and type essays.

After looking up information for an essay on suicide, Goldstein told his professor he had found all but one reason for why people consider killing themselves.

"I said to him, 'When you're 93 years old, and you have to use a computer, that makes you think of suicide!'" he laughed.

For technology training, Goldstein turned to his 16-year-old granddaughter, Emily. "I'm jealous of my grandkids who know everything about computers. Emily knows all the answers. She always helped me and came to my rescue."

So what's next for Goldstein? He said writing his memoirs should keep him busy for a while.

Winnipeg's first Jewish mayor 'humbled' by win

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sam Katz, newly elected as Winnipeg's first Jewish mayor, says he feels "humbled" that so many people have shown such trust and faith in him.

"It is one of the most humbling experiences that I have ever had," he said last week, adding he is sure his late parents, Chaim and Zena Katz, are "kvelling with pride" right now and "shepping a lot of naches."

Katz, a businessman who is best known in the city as the owner of the Winnipeg Goldeyes minor league baseball club, easily won the mayoralty contest on June 22. He replaces Glen Murray, who resigned mid-term to run for the Liberals in the federal election and was ultimately defeated. (Under the city's system of fixed election dates, the mayoralty and 15 city council positions are up for grabs every four years, meaning Katz's first term will end in 2½ years.)

Sam Katz

Katz defeated eight other candidates, including two sitting city councillors (who both resigned their council seats to run), two former city councillors, a former provincial cabinet minister (who also resigned her seat to enter the race) and a former Saskatchewan MP who moved to Winnipeg a few years ago.

Even though Katz had no political experience and was the last candidate to enter the race, he received close to 100,000 votes, nearly double the tally of his closest rival. His success was based largely on name recognition and the personal popularity he built up over the years as a baseball team owner and entertainment impresario.

Now that he is inside City Hall, Katz said he is looking forward to working closely with council. "I have assured all the councillors that my door will always be open to every one of them," he said. "I have made a point of meeting with every one of them individually."

He admitted he is still being brought up to date on the issues.

Politics is actually the new mayor's fourth career. He was born in 1951 in Rehovot, Israel, to Holocaust survivors. The family, including older brother David, moved to Winnipeg in the early 1950s.

After graduating from university, Katz's first business venture was a clothing store in Brandon, Manitoba's second-largest city. A couple of years later, he opened a branch in Winnipeg.

After selling his clothing stores, he began dabbling in real estate.

He ended up owning a building that he turned into a social hall. He began booking acts for it, and a few years later, he formed Showtime Productions, which grew into one of Winnipeg's major concert promoters. Katz brought in such big names as the Rolling Stones and Paul McCartney, as well as touring Broadway musicals such as Evita and Phantom of the Opera.

Always a sports fan, Katz was determined in the early 1990s to bring professional baseball back to Winnipeg. His successful and much-publicized efforts highlighted an ability to persevere despite intense opposition and numerous stumbling blocks.

He first tried to bring a Triple A team to the city, but no league wanted a team in Winnipeg, so he hooked up with the new Northern League, an independent league that develops young players and gives veterans a second chance.

The Goldeyes played their first few seasons in the home of the Blue Bombers football club while Katz fought tooth and nail to build his own ballpark. He faced strong opposition at the time from the mayor and some city councillors, but he was eventually able to build his ballpark. Since the 7,000-seat Canwest Global Park opened in 1995, the Goldeyes have been the hottest summer ticket in town, regularly selling out every home game.

In the Jewish community, Katz has been honoured by the local chapter of the Canadian Associates of the Ben-Gurion University and the YMHA (now the Rady Jewish Community Centre). He has been actively involved with both.

Katz is married to Baillie and they have a young daughter named Ava.

Israel-based organization in Toronto seeks dynamic, motivated individual with the following qualifications.

The successful candidate will be a creative and hard working individual who sees challenges as opportunities. The position requires experience in public relations and marketing. Knowledge of Israel is essential and proficiency in French and Hebrew would be a strong asset.

If you consider yourself a candidate, please fax your resume to 416-964-2420 no later than July 15, 2004.

Montreal Jews stay faithful to the Liberals

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Jews in Montreal stuck to their traditional Liberal vote, as did most anglophone and ethnic voters.

Mount Royal returned Justice Minister Irwin Cotler to Parliament with a 76 per cent majority, the highest for a Liberal candidate in the country, and the third-highest overall, behind two Conservative candidates in Alberta.

The two other Jewish Liberal incumbents in Quebec, government House leader Jacques Saada and backbencher Raymonde Folco, were re-elected in, respectively, Brossard-La Prairie, on the South Shore, and Laval-Les Iles, north of Montreal.

Cotler not only won all 192 polls, he garnered a majority in each of them, which is an accomplishment, he said, considering there were seven candidates. Nevertheless, his showing was a drop from his 82 per cent majority in the 2000 election.

The turnout in Mount Royal was 52.7 per cent, said Mount Royal Liberal Association president Mark Leiter.

Although it takes in such largely Jewish areas as Cote St. Luc and Hampstead, Mount Royal is not as Jewish as it used to be. According to the 2001 census, 36 per cent of the population is Jewish, but Cotler believes it is more like 30 to 35 per cent today.

Cotler receives third highest majority in Canada

Assessing his victory, Cotler stressed the multicultural nature of the riding and the support he received from all communities. He calls it a "rainbow coalition." (Mount Royal has the seventh-highest number of Muslims among Quebec ridings, representing 5.5 per cent of the population.)

Despite having a safe seat, Cotler said he campaigned "flat out… I think it is my most satisfying victory because the wind was blowing the other way [against the Liberals] in the province."

Cotler said he met "head-on" criticism from Jews about the Liberal government's record on Israel. "When I met Jewish groups, I didn't wait for the issue to be raised. Some of that criticism was based on incorrect information," he said, referring to an advertisement on the issue in The CJN.

"It spoke of Israel receiving zero dollars in aid from Canada and the Palestinians $250 million, but didn't say that Israel is ineligible, as a developed country, for aid and that the money to the Palestinians is humanitarian assistance."

As for Canada's voting record at the United Nations (UN), Cotler said an "empirical study" shows that under the previous Progressive Conservative government "it was even worse" in voting for or abstaining from resolutions denouncing Israel.

Over the Liberals' 11 years in power, "I believe that it is being incrementally improved… And we are committed to the larger issue of UN reform to ensure no state is singled out."

He defended Liberal policy of supporting both the security for Israel and the "legitimate right of the Palestinians to a democratic state… There is no contradiction in that."

Asked if he expects to be re-appointed to cabinet, Cotler, 64, said if Paul Martin calls, he will gladly serve. "I was very happy being justice minister and attorney-general. For a human-rights lawyer, it was a kind of dream."

Folco, 64, who was first elected in 1997 (her riding was previously called Laval West), said she has cabinet aspirations. "I was the only Liberal elected north of the Island of Montreal. There is always hope," she said, "but I don't like to tempt the devil."

Laval-Les Iles takes in a part of Chomedey, where the great majority of the area's Jews live. (The 2001 census found 3,760 Jews lived in the Chomedey district.)

Folco said she had the support of much of the Jewish community in the heated battle she fought to keep the Liberal nomination, which she won in March. She was challenged by Barbara Mergl, a member of the riding's Liberal association executive. In February, Folco filed a complaint with the RCMP that her phone had been tapped.

Folco took 48 per cent of the vote. Runner-up Micael Poirier, a CEGEP student with no political experience, finished more than 5,000 votes behind Folco. Laval-Les Iles is about 60 per cent francophone, and has a significant ethnic population, especially Greek.

Because of the nomination battle, Folco said she was, in effect, campaigning for almost nine months and she believes that made the difference against rising support for the Bloc Québécois.

Saada, 57, who was also first elected in 1997, managed to hang on to Brossard-La Prairie on Montreal's South Shore by a 2,500-vote margin over the Bloc's Marcel Lussier. The riding is about 70 per cent francophone, with a significant ethnic population. There are perhaps a couple of hundred Jews. (The 2001 census identified 750 Jews in all of the South Shore.)

Early in the campaign, several of Saada's posters were daubed with swastikas.

In Outremont, chassidic and haredi Jews there may have been the deciding factor in the election of Jean Lapierre, Prime Minister Paul Martin's Quebec lieutenant, according to Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Hassidic Organizations.

Lapierre, the former Bloc MP who ran for the first time as a Liberal, won by 3,000 votes, which is about the number of votes the chassidic and haredi communities delivered, Werzberger said.

Overall voter turnout in the riding was 59 per cent, but among chassidim and haredim, it was about 85 per cent, he said.

The communities are traditionally Liberal, but Werzberger said Lapierre made an effort to reach out, visiting some of the synagogues, and that helped shore up support for him.

Coast to Coast

'Wait and see mode' on Liberal minority

Canadian Jewish Congress, meanwhile, noted the re-election of key pro-Israel MPs while taking a wait and see attitude to future government policy towards Israel and on national security issues. Congress, along with other Jewish advocacy organizations, had been critical of Canada's voting record on UN resolutions affecting Israel. Candidates canvassed by The CJN acknowledged Jewish voters brought up that issue – among others – during the campaign.

Kadis, a former school trustee, said her campaign stressed strong support for Israel."I will encourage more balanced resolutions. That will be a priority for me," she said.

Kadis said she expects to join Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, a group of MPs and senators who have pushed for a more pro-Israel stance. The group includes Bennett, Peterson, Volpe, Folco, Marlene Jennings, Bernard Patry, Cotler and Senator Leo Kolber. Neville and senators Richard Kroft of Winnipeg and Jack Austin of Vancouver are also members.

Kadis said she would condemn manifestations of anti-Semitism and other forms of racism when they occur and she would push for a change in the way Ontario funds religious schools. Only Roman Catholic schools currently receive government funds and "we definitely have to right that wrong," she said.

During the campaign, Kadis encountered many voters angry at the Liberal sponsorship scandal. "The prime minister will fix the problems to ensure that it doesn't happen again," she said.

But it was the "Liberal core values of inclusion, respect and equal opportunity" along with the party's focus on health care that, in the end, swayed voters, she said.

According to Elections Canada's preliminary results, Kadis won the riding with 54.6 per cent of the votes. Her nearest competitor, Conservative Josh Cooper, came second with 34.5 per cent of the ballots.

Despite the 20 per cent difference, Cooper said, "I think we did very well for our first time out. Eighteen thousand [voters] wanted me as their MP. For the first time out, that's fantastic."
